I should like to say in regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] that these amendments are not going to take any time that I think they will take time. I expect to devote some time to one or two of those amendments, but I have no objection to taking the bill up now. It seems to me, however, that any Senator has a right to object to taking it up to-day under the rule, and it will not cause much delay, if any, if it is allowed to go over.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator is correct about that. I do not know whether or not the Senator was present, but I obtained unanimous consent to take up the bill this morning. It has been before the Senate once to-day by unanimous consent, and that waives the objection and gives the bill the status of any other bill on the calendar, in my judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. Even though the Senator is right in that contention, if he is going simply to try to take up the bill and then lay it aside, it will not be of any advantage to him, because there is no disposition to prevent the Senate from considering the bill to-morrow, as I understand.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that is not my intention.

Mr. NORRIS. If any Senator wants time to consider the bill, it seems to me that it is not an unfair request to ask that it go over.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is not my purpose, if the bill is taken up, to lay it aside.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood it was.

Mr. GORE. No, sir. That was the request of the Senator from Utah; and that would be largely a perfunctory proceeding, in which I do not care to participate. Of course, if the Chair holds my motion out of order that ends it; but if the Chair holds the motion in order, the Senate can take the responsibility of considering the bill or of passing it over. As chairman of the committee, appreciating the importance of this legislation, I am not willing to take the responsibility for delaying it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to paragraph 2 of Rule XXVI, which provides:

> All reports of committees and motions to discharge a committee from the consideration of the subject, and all subjects from which a committee shall be discharged, shall lie over one day for consideration unless, by unanimous consent, the Senate shall otherwise direct.

This bill was reported this morning, Mr. President. It has not been one day since it was reported, and therefore I hold that the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma is out of order.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there is no controversy about the rule. The point is that the Senate has otherwise ordered, which the rule permits. The Senate did authorize the consideration of this bill this morning by unanimous consent. That waives the objection; and now the bill has the status that it would have had if it had lain over one day. I think the motion is clearly in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair believes that paragraph 2 of Rule XXVI is applicable to this case, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from Utah.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. MYERS. No; not until I can make an explanation. I apprehend the Senator from Virginia may want to move an adjournment.

Mr. MARTIN. I will say frankly to the Senator that so many Senators desire an opportunity to investigate this food bill that I propose to make that motion to give them that opportunity.

I do not wish, however, to take the Senator from Montana off the floor.

Mr. MYERS. Before that motion is made I want to explain that I wish to move an executive session for a few moments, and then an adjournment can be had if the Senate so desires. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes appear to have it.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for a division.

On a division, the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ARMOR-PLATE PLANT AT CHARLESTON, W. VA.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to send to the desk to be read a telegram from the former governor of Alaska, Hon. W. E. Clark, now owner and editor of the Charleston Mail, relating to a letter which was read into the RECORD on Monday last by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and which contained an intimation that undue speculation in lands at Charleston, W. Va., and vicinity might operate to the disadvantage of the employees of the armor-plate plant recently located there.

Mr. Clark is peculiarly qualified to speak with authority and disinterestedly on this matter. I commend his telegram to the attention of the Senate, and give to his statement my unqualified indorsement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

CHARLESTON, W. VA., May 22, 1917.

Hon. HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The solicitude of the resolutions committee of the National City planning conference over the housing of workers in the proposed Government factories at Charleston is entirely unwarranted. There has been no more speculation in land values than is natural and usual in such cases, and no very serious effect of the present real estate activity is expected. The housing question has been taken up by an association of substantial local citizens, and the Government may feel well assured that a comprehensive and wholly satisfactory plan will be carried out.

WALTER E. CLARK.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 24, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. STEENERSON. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Army bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the Army bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 328) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce" as amended in respect of car service, and for other purposes, had insisted upon its amendment, had requested a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. CUMMINS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce as amended, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2133. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280.

Mr. KITCHIN. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business on Calendar Wednesday's calendar for to-day be dispensed with until we complete the consideration of the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the business on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with until we finish the revenue bill.

Mr. MANN. Why not dispense with it for the day? It would still have the right of way.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then I will make the request to dispense with it altogether for to-day.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ADAMSON. Touching the remark just made, I think the bill that was up on Calendar Wednesday was made privileged. That took it out of Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. It was not privileged.

The SPEAKER. What is it the gentleman from Georgia wants to know?

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to know whether the agricultural bill that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] had up on last Calendar Wednesday would still hold its place on Calendar Wednesday, or is it removed from Calendar Wednesday by the order unanimously given making it privileged?

Mr. MANN. There was no order making it privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that order affects its status so far as Calendar Wednesday is concerned. It changes it so far as other days are concerned.

The question is on the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4280.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to say that this amendment does not affect anyone unless he pays a surtax.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page——

Mr. MANN. Section 504 has not been acted upon by the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. We are going to come to that in order and return to the Fitzgerald amendment that we considered the other day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall offer it.

Mr. MANN. Section 504 has not been acted on at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. We thought we would get up to that as we go along.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 5, page 6, to consider the Fitzgerald amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. FITZGERALD offered an amendment the other day to section 5, on page 6.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment was offered at the end of section 2, but the understanding was that when we recurred to it it could be offered where it would be considered the more appropriate place.

Mr. MANN. That consent has already been given, has it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that this amendment here is to section 3.

Mr. KITCHIN. It was understood that we would put it in the proper place.

Mr. MANN. Nobody will object if we ask unanimous consent to return to section 6 for the purpose of offering a new section.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pending amendment and to offer an amendment as a new section.

Mr. MANN. As section 6.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As sections 6 and 7, the following——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment as a new section, to be called "sections 6 and 7." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

After section 5, page 6, add the following:

"SEC. 6. That on and after January 1, 1918, individuals, partnerships, withholding agents, corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies, liable for the payment of income, munitions, or excess-profits taxes under existing law or under this act shall pay without levy, assessment, or notice, simultaneously with the submission of their return of tax, the amount of tax for the payment of which they are shown by such return to be liable. If any tax is not paid at the time when it is due under the provisions of this section, there shall be added (except in the case of an error made in good faith in computing the amount of the tax) the sum of 5 per cent to the amount of tax unpaid and interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month upon the amount of such unpaid tax from the time it becomes due. This section shall not apply in the case of any income tax (payable otherwise than by a withholding agent) imposed upon an individual upon whose net income no tax is imposed under subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, or under section 2 of this act.

"SEC. 7. That collectors of internal revenue are authorized to receive uncertified checks in payment of income, munitions, and excess-profits taxes, during such time and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; but if a check so received is not paid by the bank on which it is drawn the person by whom such check has been tendered shall remain liable for the payment of the tax and for all legal penalties and additions the same as if such check had not been tendered."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say the committee will accept that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the committee examined the amendment which I have submitted and is willing to accept it in this form. It differs from the amendment as originally presented in two respects. It does not apply to incomes where a tax is not paid on incomes in excess of $5,000, and it excepts from the penalty those who in good faith make an error in computing the amount due upon their return.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I was going to ask the gentleman a question in that connection. Suppose a man in computing the amount due computes an amount greater than ought to be paid. Is there any chance for him to get his money back if he sends the check?

Mr. MANN. That is now provided for by law.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; by the act of September 8, 1916.

Mr. MADDEN. How does he get it back?

Mr. MANN. By making a claim.

Mr. MADDEN. He has to make it through Congress, has he not?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. MADDEN. It will take a long while.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. I have had experience in adjusting claims.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not for paying more than you should.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; for paying more than I should. I do not think the department ought to be in a position where they can accept more. They ought to compute the tax over and if they ascertain that a mistake has been made in favor of the Government they ought to correct the amount and send the check back. If that computation shows a less amount than the Government has coming to it, they will promptly send the check back; you may be sure of that. They ought to be compelled to send it back in the other case. Why should the individual have all the burden placed on him?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The law provides a simple method, as I understand, whereby anyone who pays more than he should can have a return made of the excess. That is not a difficult matter to arrange. Personally I believe this system should be applied to all incomes, but the committee is of the opinion that it is advisable to except incomes of persons where they will not be in excess of $5,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the easiest income in the world to compute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and the people who receive only $5,000 or less are probably the more intelligent on the average.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am anxious to have this amendment adopted and the proposed change of payment started, because I believe it will result beneficially.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it will be a great hardship to the people of the country to be compelled to make out their statement of income and inclose with the statement a check; a hardship greater than the gentleman or anybody here supposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, that is a matter of opinion. I do not agree with the gentleman. I think our present system is so absurd that it could not exist in any place except under the Government of the United States.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Under the present law the date for the return of the income-tax return is March 1. The date for the payment of the amount is in the latter part of the month of June; I think June 15. If this amendment is adopted, at which period would the payment be made; when the return is made in March or on June 15?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the proposed amendment the return must be made by the 1st of March. That is not changed. The check would be mailed at the same time. In that respect it makes a difference which, in my opinion, ought not to exist between the time when the income would be paid by different classes of persons. Those who are paying on an income below $5,000 would have the same period in which to make payment that they have now, while those who would be paying upon incomes in excess of $5,000 would have the income-paying period advanced.

Mr. SNYDER. I think that is a mistake. I think the period of payment should be put further ahead—somewhere between the time of the return and the time of the payment as fixed at present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe the earlier the payment, the better it would be for the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Does this require a certified check or an ordinary check?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The section provides that uncertified checks may be accepted, and in the event they are not honored they would be treated as if they were not sent, and the penalty would run as if no attempt had been made to pay.

Mr. BORLAND. It is the ordinary business check?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the ordinary business check. I am so hopeful that something will be done. I believe that if this amendment is adopted it should be so amended or modified as to make all the taxes payable under the same circumstances and within the same period. A very slight amendment would do so. Not knowing just the particular time the committee desired to have the income paid I did not attempt to fix it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the gentleman's statement, the payment at the time the return is made will not apply to those persons who for the first time are included under the income-tax provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would not apply to any person who does not pay upon incomes in excess of $5,000.

Mr. MANN. Yes. Now, the great mass of persons in number who will pay the income tax will be in that class. If I understand the purpose of this amendment, it is largely to do away with the supernumerary work of red tape and the great useless clerical work now being performed. Yet the first thing the amendment does is to say that eight-tenths of those who pay the income tax shall not be affected by this amendment to save labor, and those in the main are the ones who will pay $10 or $20 of income tax.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I stated that I believed it was a mistake to exempt them from the operation of this provision, but the committee was rather inclined to believe that persons who pay on less than $5,000 will make a great many mistakes. I think they will make fewer mistakes than anybody else. In my anxiety to have the reform instituted, however, I was in hope that if it was adopted in this form it would, either before the bill was perfected or that in a short time after the enactment, result in the same provision being extended to all who pay the income taxes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Does not the gentleman from North Carolina believe that it would be at least worthy of consideration that if the checks for the payment of the income tax were to be sent with the return, the return might be delayed at least 30 or 60 days' time? The return now has to be made before March 1. The tax has to be paid June 30. Now, if we are going to make the payment come March 1 instead of June 30, that is quite a change. It may be that everybody who pays the income tax, including corporations, has saved up the money during the preceding year, and the sooner they get rid of it the better they are satisfied, but I have some doubts about that. It seems to me there ought to be a little further time given.

Mr. KITCHIN. What would be the gentleman's suggestion—about May 1? There is something in what the gentleman says, that it looks as if we ought to extend the time a little.

Mr. MANN. I should think April 1 or May 1.

Mr. KITCHIN. Say May 1.

Mr. MANN. Now, on the other point, you have exempted from the provisions of this section most of those who will pay the tax and make the returns. I suspect that a very large portion of the people who make the small returns would prefer to pay the tax when they make their returns, rather than to be annoyed with wondering when they are going to get a notice, and then have to make a second communication to the Collector of Internal Revenue. I think that even if you do not require it you certainly ought, as long as lists will be kept anyhow in the collector's office, to permit any of these people to make the payment, even if they are not required to make it at the time they make the returns.

Mr. HASTINGS. Many of us have not been able to hear the section read. Will the gentleman kindly explain who are exempt under the provisions of the section?

Mr. MANN. All those with incomes of less than $5,000, but that will be the great mass in numbers, because that will cover those who do not now pay an income tax. Now, if you take the number who are single and receive salaries of $1,000, or if married $2,000, the number will be very vastly increased.

I would always pay my income tax when I made my return if I could. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] stated the other day that he did so. Well, he has a personal friend in the office of the collector who lays aside his check and takes the responsibility of it. But the collectors usually will not do that, because they might be held personally responsible if the check was lost, and they can not put it on their books.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This proposal in the Fitzgerald amendment is so good that it does seem to me that part of its value to the Government and to the taxpayer will be lost if we limit it to incomes of over $5,000. In fact, it seems to me as I look at it that it is of more value to those having incomes under $5,000 than to those whose incomes are over that amount. One reason is that there are a larger number of the incomes under $5,000, and therefore the saving of clerical labor will be that much greater if the check is sent in at the time the return is made.

Another reason is that the amount of the tax on incomes under $5,000 is relatively very small, and it is a very small burden upon that particular taxpayer to send in a check promptly when he sends in his return. In fact, in many cases he would rather do it than wait until he gets a bill from the collector, and then run the risk of sending it at the proper time or being liable to a penalty. I think nearly every man here who has had that experience would be glad to send in his check, which is relatively small, when he sends in his return, and to know then that unless he hears from the collector and some objection is made to the amount or the form of the return, his income-tax business for that year is finished. It does seem to me we ought not to limit this. The only objection I have to the amendment is that it limits it to incomes above $5,000. On that particular point, I want to oppose extending the time for making the return. The time now for the making of a return for the calendar year closing December 31 is set for March 1. That is sufficient time to give a man opportunity to go over his books and adjust his accounts and to find out the necessary facts to make his return. If the time is extended until the 1st of May to make a return, we are not benefiting him to any extent except the possible interest on his money. In the vast number of cases the interest on his money is not sufficient to warrant the difficulty in making the return later instead of on the 1st of March. To the Government it would make a vast deal of difference. The more promptly these taxes come in the more beneficial they are to the Government, the better the Government can use the money, and the more certain it is of the extent of its income within its hands for that particular fiscal period.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the purpose of the introduction of this amendment to be originally that it would save $500,000 a year in auditing the accounts.

Mr. BORLAND. I think so.

Mr. MADDEN. It will not save anything. It will just continue to maintain the same expense that is being maintained now.

Mr. BORLAND. No; I do not agree with the gentleman about that. I think it will save a great deal of clerical labor, and I think with the addition of the large number of taxpayers to the income-tax roll we must find a way of saving the additional labor. I do not think there is going to be enough help in the offices of the collectors of internal revenue in the various districts to do all of this work. The collector sends out now to the taxpayer a slip, practically a bill, and that requires a letter, asking him at the right time, before June 30, to send back his check, and then the collector must send a receipt for it. Now, that is all a duplication of labor. If the taxpayer sends in his check at the time he sends in his return, and it is found accurate, as it would be in 99 per cent of the cases, it would simply be necessary to send a receipted certificate, and that would close the matter for that year. It would decrease at least 60 per cent, perhaps 75 per cent, the amount of clerical labor in the office of the collectors of internal revenue for the various districts. I think the amendment is a good one. I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois that there are going to be any evil consequences from it. It is going to be a convenience to the taxpayer and also to the Government, a saving in expense to the Government, and, in my judgment, that would be all the more true if we made it apply to all incomes, especially small incomes.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the gentleman thinks it is a convenience to the taxpayer to send a check when he has not the money?

Mr. BORLAND. That is the only point; and if the gentleman is like me he is no more apt to have the money on the 1st of May than he is on the 1st of March.

Mr. MADDEN. I have to borrow it.

Mr. BORLAND. I have never found it any easier on the 1st of May to get the money than on the 1st of March.

Mr. MADDEN. It would be a very great convenience to the gentleman, then, to pay it.

Mr. BORLAND. I would just as soon do it on the 1st of March, and then I would know I had that bill paid. I do not know about the other. I do hope the amendment will be modified to include all incomes which pay any tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to the amendment, unless somebody else offers one.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again read to see whether there are any changes in it or not.

Mr. MANN. I want to offer an amendment to strike out that exception.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to be inserted after the word "liable" in line 8 of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "liable," in line 8 of the amendment, insert the following:

"Provided, That such individuals, partnerships, corporations, joint-stock companies, associations, and insurance companies shall have until April 15 in each year to make such return and pay such tax."

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman mean to change the date of payment of the income tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; those liable under this provision, and that means all corporations and individuals whose income is over $5,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. And you extend the time for making the returns, but shorten the time for making the payments.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is a very serious matter. The existing law permits them to make payments any time before June 1, and under the rules and regulations prescribed by the department 10 days have been added, and now if you shorten the time you will find that it is a serious matter to the average institution making returns.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman make provision for those corporations which make returns based on their fiscal year?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that in the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They make the return at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am asking whether the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina would in any way controvert the purpose of those returns?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it does.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think some limitation should be incorporated in the gentleman's amendment to cover that case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understand from the gentleman from North Carolina that his amendment would set aside the arrangement under existing law whereby corporations are permitted to make returns based on their fiscal year, and compel them to make a payment on April 15. If that is the case, as I understand the gentleman from North Carolina admits, the amendment to the amendment should not be adopted. Let the original Fitzgerald amendment stand on its merits, and have the payments made at the time when the returns are made under existing law.

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether the amendment would have that effect. This amendment extends the time to April 15, and that will not cut off the present arrangement about corporations using their own fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from North Carolina says it would.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said that I feared that it would.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported so that we may know the full purport of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, that bears out the contention that I made originally. If corporations make a return following April 15 based on their fiscal year, I assume that they will be granted until April 15 of the following year to make the payment. Under existing law corporations are privileged to make returns, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, based on their fiscal year. Assuming they are making returns based on the fiscal year ending June 30, they are obliged, under existing law, to make payment in 105 days after that date. Under this amendment the corporation would have the privilege to defer payment until the following April 15. Of course, that is not the purpose of the mover of the amendment. If that is the case, I think the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina should be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, at the end of section 6, the following:

"Provided, however, That it shall be lawful to pay any income, munitions, and excess profits tax simultaneously with the filing of the return."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the limitation applies to a corporation tax based on the capital of a corporation known as the capital-stock tax? I do not think it would be included in the description of the return, as stated in the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It applies to the income tax, munitions tax, and excess profits tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the capital-stock tax is not an income tax, as I understand it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is to make it permissible for anyone to pay the tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why does not the gentleman make it apply to the capital-stock tax as well as to the other three described in the amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not easy to work out an amendment on the floor in the way it should be. If the amendment is adopted I have no doubt the department will take up the question, and by the time the managers on the part of the two Houses get together it will be possible for them so to frame the amendment as to work no injustice to anyone affected, and yet accomplish a great reform.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the purpose of the new amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the amendment offered, when these people pay the income tax in excess of $5,000 they are required to pay the tax when they make the return. This makes it permissible for anyone to do it.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the amendment read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It provides that it shall be lawful to pay any income tax when the return is filed to cover the situation described by the gentleman from Illinois. The benefit that will result from the adoption of this amendment is great, and I hope the amendment will be adopted and perfected later, so as to work no injustice to those who are required to pay the tax at a time other than now fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to his original amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 121, noes 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a new section to that title.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, after the new section 7, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 8. That the provisions of this title shall not extend to the Philippine Islands, and the Philippine Legislature shall have power by due enactment to amend, alter, modify, or repeal the income-tax laws in force in the Philippine Islands."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order. I do not see why we should give them privileges that we do not ourselves enjoy.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I will tell the gentleman why this is. The Philippine act of August 5 passed after we had passed the income tax of September 8. We did not intend the act of September 8 to apply to the people in the Philippine Islands. After it had passed the House, the act of August 5 came back, giving the Philippine Islands full power to levy an income tax, and it so happens that the income tax of September 8 applies, when it is not the intention to make it apply.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman means there was no intention to apply the income tax to the people of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; because under the legislative act of August 5 they have the power to do that. This is to correct that.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the income tax apply to the Hawaiian Islands and Porto Rico?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know about Hawaii or Porto Rico; but this is in conformity with the act of August 5, 1916.

Mr. MADDEN. They are not subject to the income tax which we passed?

Mr. KITCHIN. They were subjected to the income tax of September 8, but not intentionally so. This relieves them, and is in conformity with the Philippine act of August 5, 1916.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 20 for the purpose of offering an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 20, line 9, before the word "within" insert "or regular stagecoach or automobile line," and a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to page 20 for the purpose of offering the amendment which has just been reported. Is there——

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not have to make the point of order. He can object to returning.

Mr. NOLAN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for 10 minutes upon this bill. I have not had any time as yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the committee for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I have not had any time upon this bill, and before we reach a vote I want to say something about it. I am utterly surprised that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING] should object, because the members of the Committee on Ways and Means have been making speeches upon this bill for two weeks.

Mr. HELVERING. The gentleman from Kansas has not had any more time than the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 20 for the purpose of offering the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 20, line 9, after the word "water," strike out the words "within the United States," and after the word "paid," in line 8, insert the same language.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan whether that would not now apply to a ticket purchased in the United States to go to Europe?

Mr. CRAMTON. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object to returning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, we passed section 504 with the right to recur, with amendments pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 504 was passed over with the right to recur, with amendments pending. The Clerk will report the amendments in their order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the section first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 504. That from and after the 1st day of June, 1917, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid by any person, corporation, partnership, or association to any other person, corporation, partnership, or association for advertising or advertising space other than in newspapers and periodicals.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FITZGERALD: Strike out, on page 23, in line 9, the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "one," and in lines 12 and 13, on page 23, strike out the words "or advertising space other than in newspapers and periodicals" and insert in lieu thereof the words "other than in newspapers whose circulation does not exceed 5,000 copies: Provided, That the gross receipts for advertisements to the amount of $1,000 by any person, persons, firm, or corporation shall be exempt from the tax," so that the section will read:

"That from and after the 1st day of June, 1917, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax equivalent to 1 per cent of the amount paid by any person, corporation, partnership, or association to any other person, corporation, partnership, or association for advertising other than in newspapers whose circulation does not exceed 5,000 copies: Provided, That the gross receipts for advertisements to the amount of $1,000 by any person, persons, firm, or corporation shall be exempt from the tax."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to substitute for that amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] an amendment striking out section 504.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to strike out the section. The question is, first——

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to be heard on that motion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understand now that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] proposes to support the proposition to strike out section 504, which he has just offered?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir; to strike that out.

Mr. MANN. Of course, technically, the section is first subject to amendment, and there have been a lot of amendments suggested. But I am inclined to think, owing to the history of the past few days, that the gentleman from North Carolina having made the motion to strike out section 504, and is going to vote for it, it would be an idle and useless ceremony to spend any time in perfecting it.

Mr. SABATH. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] a question.

Mr. KITCHIN. I refuse to permit the gentleman to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask it, anyway. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] why, when it is necessary to raise such a large sum of money for the war, it is now proposed to eliminate from a fair contribution street-car advertising, bill-poster advertising, sign advertising, and advertising in magazines and newspapers? If increased taxes are to be placed on foodstuffs, why let these business enterprises escape?

Mr. KITCHIN. Is the gentleman serious?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am absolutely serious. I have a number of persons in my own community anxious to contribute to the Government under these circumstances.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will make a very modest answer to the gentleman, and say that after we have increased the postage rates on newspapers and magazines it does not look as if we ought to tax now the advertisements, and if we do not tax them on that assumption it does not look right to tax the other fellow that comes in competition with the newspapers.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In the opinion of the gentleman, how much do you think we will lose?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is estimated that we will receive seven and a half million dollars from these advertisements other than newspapers and magazines, and now we do not think it will raise more than $1,200,000—$1,500,000 at the outside. Another reason that I want to strike it out is along the line that I said $1,500,000 was contemptible in the House a little while ago.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not in that classification.

Mr. DILL. What amount of revenue would be raised from newspapers as well as bill posters?

Mr. KITCHIN. About $40,000,000.

Mr. DILL. It would raise over $40,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to perfect the section.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order now. There is already an amendment pending.

Mr. KITCHIN. There are two amendments pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to take them up in order, because there can not be but one amendment considered at a time.

Mr. DILL. Would not an amendment to perfect the section be preferable to an amendment to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct; but an amendment is pending now. The gentleman will be recognized to offer his amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to strike out the section; but if that amendment does not prevail, it shall be in order to offer amendments to perfect the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that the vote first be taken on the amendment to strike out the section. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, will there be time to debate the amendment to strike out?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the vote is taken on this amendment and the amendment is stricken out.

Mr. DILL. Will there be allowed time for debate before? I would like to have five minutes. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes and after that that the vote shall be taken on my amendment. If it does not prevail, then that the paragraph be subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair ask if he will not include the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], who is trying to get time?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not a proper time to discuss that question so long as there is a motion pending to strike the section out of the bill. If that question fails, the gentleman will have plenty of time to discuss that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to voting on the striking out first? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Now, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. DILL. That was a part of the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL] may have five minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you are going to have a vote on this before striking it out, I object.

Mr. DILL. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SABATH. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DILL. I have a right, Mr. Chairman, to oppose the amendment, certainly?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is——

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have five minutes myself.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then make it 25 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Can you give me two minutes?

Mr. DILLON. I would like to have one minute.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will perhaps move to close debate. I withdraw my request.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have read in my time an amendment which I desire to offer if this amendment fails.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILL: Page 23, line 12, after the word "or" where it occurs the second time in the line, insert the word "for," and in line 13, after the word "space," strike out the words "other than."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know what time for debate is fixed on this.

The CHAIRMAN. There is none except that provided under the rule.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, this is the greatest taxation bill ever proposed in the American Congress. It proposes to tax the people to the amount of nearly $2,000,000,000 the coming year. The amendment I have proposed will add more than $37,000,000 and at the same time do simple justice to the other kinds of advertising business taxed by this bill.

My principal reason for wanting to discuss this proposition is to call the attention of the House to the fact that this section of the bill as it now reads proposes to penalize every man who wants to advertise in any way except in a newspaper. I believe that newspaper advertising ought to be compelled to pay the same rate of taxation as any other kind of advertising. The newspapers of this country have done more to agitate and bring about the war in which we are now engaged than any other force in America, and I can not understand how the Committee on Ways and Means could bring into this House a proposition to impose a penalty upon every man who proposes to advertise in any way except in the great newspapers of the country.

The chairman of the committee referred to the amount to be raised by this section as an insignificant sum. Certainly it is not an insignificant sum when we remember that if we apply this 5 per cent tax to newspaper advertising we shall raise more than $40,000,000. I think that is a very considerable sum, a sum that is worth being kept in mind in the framing of this bill for the purpose of producing revenue. One thing is certain: Either we should strike out all of this section or else we should make the advertising tax bear the same on newspaper advertising as on other advertising.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman understand that the motion that has been made is to strike out the section?

Mr. DILL. Yes; I do understand that quite thoroughly; and I am opposed to striking out the section, too, because I believe if you are to tax food in this country, if you are to tax tea and coffee, if you are to tax heat and electricity, if you are to tax musical instruments and everything else imaginable, and let me say now I am opposed to all such taxes, but if you are to lay such taxes, you certainly should tax advertising, and should fix the same rate of taxation on newspaper advertising as you fix on other advertising. I think it is a most serious injustice to undertake to raise revenue by taxing these small advertising concerns and then let the great newspaper organizations of the country go ahead and make their ordinary profits and in addition sufficient money out of the advertising to pay any increase in the postage rates which may be provided.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Is it the gentleman's idea to have the newspapers pay the increased postage rate and also the tax provided in section 504?

Mr. DILL. The newspapers will probably not pay it out of their ordinary receipts. They will simply add the necessary amount to their advertising rates and not pay any tax on the advertising either. What I object to is taxing billboard advertising and advertising in street cars and advertising everywhere else except in the newspapers.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. How could you possibly impose this tax on the thousands of little newspapers who do not keep accounts?

Mr. DILL. You could enforce it just as easily as you can enforce an income tax on the fellow who gets only a little over $1,000 a year. They could keep accounts.

Mr. PLATT. It would be impossible.

Mr. DILL. There is nothing so marvelous about having a small newspaper keep accounts. In the country newspaper offices it probably could not be done without some inconvenience, but in the larger newspaper offices there is no doubt but that it could readily be done.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to take this opportunity to discuss this revenue bill briefly. For several days Members of the House have been fighting over the various provisions of this bill by which everybody in America will be taxed and the poorer classes of people taxed several times.

RAISE MONEY BY TAXES ON WEALTH.

I think the theory of this measure is entirely wrong. We are at war. This is a war-revenue bill. Taxes are irksome at best, and they will bear especially heavily on the millions of common people of this Republic at this time. For this reason I would raise this $2,000,000,000, or more if necessary, by a tax on the great aggregations of wealth in this country. In short, I would raise it by a high rate of tax on incomes, on excess profits, and on big inheritances. Why, sir, a tax of 25 per cent on all incomes over $10,000 would bring more than $2,500,000,000 into the Treasury. If the rates were increased proportionately up to 50 per cent or 60 per cent on all incomes over $100,000, we could raise far more than it is designed to raise by this bill. If we raised the income-tax rates to those figures we would still not be burdening incomes as heavily as England is doing in this war. Besides, England does not allow as large an exemption as we propose.

Then, there is the excess profits tax. We propose a tax of 16 per cent on excess profits, while in England it runs up to 60 per cent, and they are now proposing to raise it to 80 per cent. Why should not we tax excess profits to a similar extent? When we allow 8 per cent profit and $5,000 surplus before beginning to levy on profits, surely the tax burden will not impoverish the big business concerns affected.

Why, Mr. Chairman, last year England raised $1,700,000,000 from incomes and excess profits alone to finance the war. The total estimated incomes of England amount to $15,000,000,000, while the total estimated incomes of the people of the United States is $45,000,000,000. In other words, if we were to tax the incomes and excess profits of the American people at the same rate being paid by the English people we could raise more than $5,000,000,000 annually from those two sources alone.

But the Secretary of the Treasury has only asked for $2,000,000,000, and surely when we have so many people making enormous incomes it is not yet necessary to burden the poor people with every imaginable kind of a tax, including even their tea and coffee and sugar. I desire to insert in the RECORD the report of the income-tax returns, which is especially interesting in this connection.

Incomes reported in 1915.

Now let us look for a moment at the tremendous profits of the great corporations which an excess profits tax would reach. I desire to insert also the report of the net profits of 44 American industrial corporations.

[1] Deficit. [2] 15 months.

I have not time to analyze these reports, but will call attention to just a few of the startling increases in profits here shown since the European war began as compared with previous to the war.

The American Smelting & Refining Co. in 1914 earned a net profit of $9,271,565. In 1916 the amount was $23,252,248, an increase in net profits of $13,980,483.

The Armour Packing Co. in 1914 earned a net profit of $7,509,908. In 1916 the amount was $20,1000,000, a net increase of $12,590,092.

The Du Pont Powder Co. in 1914 earned a net profit of $4,831,793. In 1916 the amount was $82,107,693, a net increase of $77,275,900.

The United States Steel Corporation in 1914 earned a net profit of $23,496,768. In 1916 the amount was $248,034,962.

The 44 companies named above made an aggregate in net profits in 1916 over 1914 of $591,666,151. The increase in net profits is simply the extra profits which these 44 companies have made out of the war.

If you take 24 of the principal companies listed above and compare their earnings in 1914 and 1916, you will find in these two years an increase of 500 per cent, and these increases may be expected to continue. For instance, the Steel Corporation's last quarter's earnings, just published, would indicate that; because if the same percentage is maintained for the whole year the net sum applicable to dividends for 1917 will be about $450,000,000.

Now, let us compare the increased earnings and the increased stock values of two of these corporations in order to get a still more concrete idea of the increased wealth which offers the country a ready source of war taxation.

United States Steel Corporation.

Net earnings, 1914	$23,496,768
Net earnings, 1916	271,531,730
Increase	248,034,962
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1914	682,648,282
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1916	961,181,378
Increase	278,533,096

Bethlehem Steel Corporation.

Net earnings, 1914	$5,590,020
Net earnings, 1916	43,593,968
Increase	38,003,948
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1914	17,536,690
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1916	106,112,130
Increase	88,575,440

CONSIDER ALSO THE PROFITS OF THE RAILROADS.

In 1913 the net operating revenue ran, approximately, from $275 a mile in January to $300 a mile in December. In 1916 the net operating revenue ran, approximately, from $337 a mile in January to $550 in October.

The net revenue for railroads earning over a million dollars annually for the six months ending January 1, 1917, was practically $700,000,000, which is the largest profit in the history of American railroading, and yet the railroads are insisting on a 15 per cent increase in rates.

In the light of such figures nobody can for one moment seriously contend that these corporations can not far more easily bear the burden of this war taxation than the poorer classes of our people.

TAX INHERITANCES MORE HEAVILY.

But in addition to these sources of taxation, which will not seriously burden those who will be taxed, are the great inheritances which are now taxed only a comparatively small amount. At present no inheritance is taxed by the Federal Government unless it is more than $50,000. This bill proposes to lower the exemption to $25,000. I think it could well be lowered to $10,000 or even $5,000, and all inheritances over $25,000 should be taxed as heavily as necessary to raise desired revenue rather than to tax food and other necessities of life.

COULD ABOLISH INCREASE IN POSTAGE.

Would it not be far better to tax inheritances, which will not burden anyone, than to raise the same amount by a 50 per cent increase in postage—to the amount of 50 per cent on letters and 100 per cent on post cards?

Even the rates on second-class mail, which at present are so low that the Government loses large sums on the transportation of such mail every year, could be raised more gradually, if wealth were made to bear most, if not all, of this burden.

COULD STRIKE OUT ALL TAXES ON CONSUMPTION.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, we could raise not only the $2,000,000,000 asked for but even the $4,000,000,000 needed for financing this war the coming year, and we could do it, too, without adding anything to the tax burdens of the great masses of the people. We could strike out the taxes on tea, on coffee, on sugar, on electric light and heat, on gas light and heat, on telephoning and telegraphing, on freight and express bills, on letters and post cards, on notes and transfers of property, on automobile factories, on musical instruments, on drugs, on picture shows—in fact, we could eliminate every kind of a tax which the consuming public must pay by such taxes on these great aggregations of wealth.

Why, sir, we could strike out the increased tax on intoxicating liquors, in fact we could establish prohibition, and meet the resultant loss in revenue by increasing these taxes on wealth. If we increase the tax on booze, we make new rivets of gold by which the liquor traffic binds itself to the Nation. Let us free the Treasury from the need of this revenue, free the people from the curse of the traffic, and free the soldiers who must fight the battles of this war from the danger of drunkenness. Now is the time, this is the opportunity, and here the method by which to settle this liquor question forever, by settling it right.

MONEY POWER WANTS BONDS ISSUED.

What is the difficulty? Why, the great money power of America is opposed to these taxes on wealth. In short, capital is fighting against bearing the burden of the war which it did so much to promote.

Big business men all over the country say we are proposing to raise too much of this war's expense by taxation. They say we should issue more bonds. Think of it. Not content with a law that takes the young men of the country, by force if necessary, and sends them across the ocean to fight and die, while they stay at home and continue to get rich, they want to saddle still more bonds on the country instead of contributing their part to winning the war. I believe we should not only raise the $2,000,000,000 requested by the Secretary of the Treasury but we should raise every dollar needed for the actual expenses of the first year of this war by taxation. The President recommended that we pay as we go. He was right. Why not? It would still be necessary to bond the country for the $3,000,000,000 we are loaning the allies. That should be enough bonds for one year. The country was never so rich in all its history as it is to-day, and therefore never so able to pay. I am opposed to making the young men do the fighting and the dying and then when they come back from the war—that is, those that do come back alive—compelling them and their children to pay most of the bills of the war which they will have already fought.

INCREASED PRICES OF FOODSTUFFS BURDENSOME.

Another reason why the wealth of the country should bear this burden is that the increased price of foodstuffs to-day is already taxing the average family of this country almost to the point of actual want. The food pirates and price manipulations are levying a far heavier tax on food products than it would be necessary to levy on big incomes and excess profits to raise this war revenue. Let me call attention to the extent to which they have taxed and are taxing the food of this country, not for the Nation's need, but for their own private gain. The Old Dutch Market of the city of Washington recently issued a price list showing a comparison of actual prices for food in April, 1914, and April, 1916.

During that three years sugar went from 4 cents to 9 cents per pound, or an increase of 125 per cent.

The price of flour jumped from $7.25 to $14 per barrel, or 93 per cent. Corn meal from 2½ cents to 5 cent a pound, or 100 per cent. Navy beans from 7½ cents to 18 cents a pound, or 140 per cent. Lima beans from 7 cents to 20 cents a pound, or 185 per cent. Lard from 12½ cents to 25 cents a pound, or 100 per cent. Butter from 30 cents to 55 cents a pound, or 83 per cent. Eggs from 21 to 38 cents a dozen, or 80 per cent. Potatoes from 23 cents to 90 cents a peck, or 291 per cent. Onions from 4 cents to 13 cents a pound, or 250 per cent. Cabbage from 3 cents to 15 cents a pound, or 400 per cent.

These 11 articles, consisting of the most common kinds of food, show an increase of 167 per cent in three years, and if you take the whole list of 60 articles the average increase is 85 per cent for all of them.

IF WE CONSCRIPT LIVES OF SOME, WHY NOT MONEY OF OTHERS?

These are facts, Mr. Chairman, that should not be overlooked in the framing of taxation legislation. We are conscripting the men of this country to fight the war. I am in favor of conscripting the money to finance the war. We have adopted what is termed the selective draft of men so each can serve the country best. Now, let us conscript the money by a selective system which will take it from those who need it least. If we compel some men to give life itself in order to win this war, shall we hesitate to compel some other men to give such part of their wealth as will not even seriously interfere with the enjoyment of the life they are permitted to live in almost the same freedom and comfort as though there were no war? This is the thought in the minds of millions of Americans now and it will be the expression from the lips of millions more before this war has gone on many months.

MUST WIN WAR AS SOON AS POSSIBLE.

Gentlemen, I opposed this war. I spoke, voted, and did everything else I could against it. Likewise, I fought conscription. But war was declared and conscription was adopted, and I am for my country—hand, heart, and soul. I did not help start it, but I am willing and anxious to help finish it. We are going to win, and let us take such steps as will enable us to win as quickly as possible.

We must provide men and ships and money and we must provide them now, and while I should like to strike out many of the taxes to be levied by this bill and substitute taxes on wealth instead, yet if that can not be done I intend to vote for the bill anyhow. It will raise money, and money is what we must have. Then, too, it places a bigger part of the whole taxation burden on big incomes, excess profits, and inheritances than any other revenue bill which was ever passed by an American Congress. So, anyhow, we are making progress and some day we shall reach the goal of placing the burden of war taxes upon these great aggregations of wealth first, and leaving the raising of taxes by burdening the poor people as the last source of revenue.

SHOULD VOTE FOR ALL WAR MEASURES.

Another reason why I shall vote for this bill is that it is a war measure, and I have voted for every war measure which has come before this House with the exception of the conscript Army bill. I voted against that because I believed it would do more to hinder and delay than it would to help in winning the war. Without that bill the President could still have raised a million men, and that was more than could be equipped before August, 1917. Now that the bill is a law, I hope my fears were groundless and that it will enable us to raise a great and powerful Army. We may have our differences here as to the best methods to be used to win the war, but once the majority has spoken the time for differences is past. Let us go forward in the work that is to be done in the hope that peace may soon once more be reestablished throughout the great nations of the earth.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois wishes to speak now I am willing to wait, if that is satisfactory to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have about concluded the consideration of this bill in Committee of the Whole. I regret very much that I will not be able to vote for the bill on its final passage. [Applause.]

We are engaged in war. We have to have very large sums of money. We have to maintain the credit of the country in order that it may float its bonds. We have to raise large sums of money by additional taxation at the seaboard. But during the continuance of this war, owing to peculiar conditions and the fact that this country must furnish great amounts of supplies, both of foods and clothing and munitions, prices will be very high and will remain high in this country until after the close of the war.

That of itself is a great burden upon the large mass of the people of the country. The enormous prices which they will have to pay for foods and clothing will bear down heavily upon them at the very best. I think it is a mistake to add to that the effort to raise one-half of the money necessary to carry on the war by additional burdensome taxation. It is far better, in my judgment, to levy a small tax upon the people now, and to continue that tax during a series of years after the war is closed and prices of ordinary things have resumed the normal, than to add enormous taxes now to the great prices of all articles which the people need and consume.

If it should become necessary later during the continuance of the war to raise additional money by taxes in order to maintain the credit of the country, that can be done properly when new bills are brought forward providing for the issuance of new bonds.

There was once a man, it is said, who killed the goose who laid the golden eggs. I am not in favor of killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. I think this bill goes far in that direction, and for that reason I shall vote against the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I regret I can not bring myself to the point of giving this measure my support. I voted for the declaration of war. I voted for armed neutrality. I supported the military bill. I am ready and anxious to support a fair, just, and equitable revenue bill. But I do not believe in my conscience that I would be doing the best thing for my country by giving my support to the pending revenue bill.

No man in this House entertains greater respect for the membership of the Committee on Ways and Means than myself. I am not here to censure them, to blame them, or to criticize them. I have no doubt they did the very best they possibly could under the circumstances. If we were considering a protective tariff bill, drawn by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the great champion of protection, I would vote for it with my eyes shut, knowing I was serving the best interests of the American people.

Now, as for the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the great Democratic leader and the chairman of the committee which reported this bill, outside of his politics I esteem and honor him. He is honest, able, conscientious, and a patriot through and through, and the same can be truthfully said of every member of the great Ways and Means Committee.

However, nobody is really at heart for this bill, and yet a great majority are going to vote for it, and vote for it believing the great body at the other end of the Capitol is going to radically change, amend, and modify it so that when it comes back here it will be a safe and sane measure we can finally vote for. That hope and trust is uppermost in the minds of the Members of this House.

But that is not the fair and square way to meet our responsibility, to place it upon the Senate, because the Constitution gives to this House the power to originate legislation of this kind. We have had no hearings on this bill. There are 23 members on the committee, of whom 21, I believe, are lawyers and 2 are business men. Not a banker, manufacturer, farmer, laboring, or business man was summoned before the committee to give his views touching revenue legislation as it would vitally affect the welfare and prosperity of this great Nation in the pending crisis.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read an editorial which expresses my sentiments and states my position far better than I can state it myself, published in the Washington Post this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

KILL THE TAX BILL.

The tax bill framed by the House is an unnecessary load upon the people who are suffering from extortionate food prices and the shock of disorganized business resulting from the entry of the United States into the war.

It is unnecessary to raise $1,800,000,000 by taxes during this year. It is unnecessary to violate the Constitution by trying to pass an ex post facto law. It is unnecessary to frighten industry by the prospect of crushing taxes, just at the time when industry must gather strength for the greatest expansion in its history if it is to help with the war.

It is utterly unnecessary to tax foodstuffs that are already overtaxed by unregulated and unhung food pirates.

If the United States were hard pressed by its creditors and its credit were in danger there would be a necessity for heavy taxes. But the creditors of the United States are not asking for the small amount that may be due them. On the contrary, they are willing to buy more of the Government's bonds. The credit of the United States is higher than that of any other nation in the world. Its own people are ready to lend it billions of money on long time and at lower interest than is paid by any other government.

Instead of taxing the people unnecessarily at this time Congress should raise money by long-time bonds. With this threat of ruinous taxation out of the way the liberty bonds would go like hot cakes. A big blunder was made when the taxation bill was rushed into the House before the bonds were sold. Individuals and industries are frightened out of their wits. They will not buy bonds when they fear they may have to pay excessive taxes. They are wondering whether they will be able to remain in business. That is not the spirit that Congress should cultivate among the people. It should reassure them that the Government's financial burden will be distributed over a series of years; that no discriminating taxes will be levied; and that no section or industry is to be penalized or favored for any reason whatever.

The taxation bill in the House is a wet blanket upon Secretary McAdoo's campaign for the sale of the liberty bonds. As soon as possible the Senate should make known to the country that this bill will never pass. Then the people will take heart again. Wheels will begin to turn and plans will be made to expand industry to meet the needs of the Government for fighting the war. Then the bonds will be bought up by rich and poor.

Let the Senate give the country to understand that the war is to be fought for all time the end being the triumph of our democracy against the strongest assault that could be made against it. Let the people know that the immense cost of the war will be borne by those receiving the benefit of victory, as well as by those who endure the burden and shed the blood needful for victory. As the benefit will run to posterity, let posterity pay part of the cost. It can not pay in blood, but it can pay part of the money cost. And since the greater and more populous and richer United States will be better able to pay its share, posterity will still be under a deep debt to the patriots of this day who pay more than money for victory.

This Nation can not fight this war out of current revenues increased by taxation. It must go into debt. The sooner this fact is understood the better. The debt should be apportioned to the taxpayers over at least 30 years. Fifty years would be better, since the taxpayers 50 years hence will be enjoying far greater benefits than those of the immediate future, who will inherit the blood tax as well as the money tax.

[Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have been situated most of the time so that I could not be present during consideration of this bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, consisting when we are all here of 435 Members.

I am not an expert touching the raising of revenue. My congressional life has been most largely spent in recommending the expenditure of money rather than in the getting of money. I have been connected with the Committee on Appropriations. Now, when this bill is almost complete I want to say that I have an impression, according to my best judgment, that within the inhibition, if that is the proper word, against idolatory, thou shalt not worship any graven image, nor anything—I can not give you the quotation exactly, but I know the sense of it—it would not be any harm to worship this bill, because I think it is unlike anything in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth. [Applause and laughter.]

But we have got to be practical. Under the Constitution of the United States revenue legislation originates in the House of Representatives. This bill has been originated and reported by the Commitee on Ways and Means and considered in the Committee of the Whole. If I had the power I would draft a different bill, even with my imperfect knowledge touching taxation, but I have not the power. What is the situation? This is about the end of May. Preparing this bill with a hop, skip, and jump, it has taken us from the commencement of the special session, which I believe was about the 1st of April, if I recollect aright——

Mr. BROWNING. April 2.

Mr. CANNON. April 2. It has taken us a little over seven weeks to progress to the condition in which we now find ourselves. Suppose we should recommit this bill and send it back to the Committee on Ways and Means. How long it would take that committee to prepare another bill, God knows. I do not think anybody else knows. And yet it is perfectly patent that whether the bill be perfect to raise revenue, or just to the people of the United States, we have got to raise revenue. We Republicans think we have, and you Democrats think we have. So that from the practical standpoint I have made up my mind for many reasons that we had better pass this bill and let the coordinate branch, the Senate of the United States, which I understand has been holding hearings ever since the bill was reported to the House, amend the bill or pass it as we send it to them; but evidently they will amend it and send it back to the House and let it be settled in conference.

But gentlemen say, "Oh, are you not afraid to vote for this bill and then go home?" No; I am not afraid to go home after voting for this bill. I have a constituency that for many, many years have given me their confidence from time to time, believing that I act according to my best judgment upon matters of legislation. [Applause.] At times I have been attacked, but I have gotten on, and I am too old now, under these conditions, to refuse to follow my best judgment in voting for the bill. Why, think of it. If I had the power, I would raise one-quarter to one-third of the money to carry on this war and support the Government during the continuation of the war by taxation. I would raise at least a quarter and not to exceed a third of the money in that way. This is an effort to raise, I believe, for the coming fiscal year, half of the expenditures by taxation. But we can not back out. We can not say, "If this thing or that thing or the other thing had not been done, or something else had been done, we would not be in our present condition." We are in a condition where we can not back out, but we have got to go on to the bitter, bloody end, whatever the cost, and we have got to win with our allies. [Applause.]

So that while the bill does not please me, while I think it raises more money than we ought to raise, yet, as I must choose between this bill and perhaps one that is worse than this bill, I can see no hope of its being better prepared by this House, and I think from my standpoint it is patriotic to vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to strike out the section, which, by unanimous consent, the committee will first vote upon.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to inquire whether it is now in order for us to spend some three or four more days in general discussion of this bill, or whether this discussion ought not to be confined to the amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not answer that as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, nobody realizes better than I do that we must have money to conduct the war, and no one is more anxious to furnish every facility to the President of the United States to enable him to conduct the war successfully. But I am not convinced that this bill is justified. I believe it levies a greater tax upon the industries of the country than ought to be imposed at this time. I believe the imposition of the tax proposed in this bill will retard the progress of the country and embarrass the financing of the war. If this was a court of last resort, and there was nothing else to do except to vote for this bill, I would vote for it, notwithstanding the many unjust provisions which it contains. But there being another court to which this bill must be referred for further consideration, I hope it will come back greatly improved, that the American people will be given to understand after the bill leaves this House that there is a disposition somewhere in the legislative branch of the Government to treat the business of the country and the people of the country along lines of justice. I do not believe this bill extends such treatment to the people of the country, and therefore I do not think my conscience will allow me to vote to approve it. So I shall vote against the bill, with the hope that when it comes back in modified form I shall be able to give my hearty approval to it, and that it will provide the means by which we can do justice to the people who pay the bills and at the same time enable the President of the United States successfully to conduct the war. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, we have still other amendments here to be disposed of after the one pending, and I hope that we may get to them as soon as possible.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to delay the House at this time, but I am going to cast a peculiar vote, and I wish to give my reasons for it. I have been very much troubled and concerned as to how to vote on this bill. There is no need of criticizing the bill; it has been criticized sufficiently by its friends. Perhaps I should say by its supporters, for apparently it has no friends. It is full of injustices and inequities as it seems to me. I can not bring myself to vote for it, yet at the same time I recognize the force of the argument made by the chairman that the country must have the money, that we are in a great crisis, and that huge sums must be provided, and therefore I hate to vote against the only proposition before us to provide the money.

I might do as the gentleman from North Carolina says he is going to do, shut my eyes and vote for it, but I remember that when the blind leads the blind, both are likely to fall into the ditch. Therefore I have come to the conclusion that I will simply vote "Present." I will not vote for the bill, and I do not wish to try to obstruct it by voting against it, and so I shall allow the bill to take its course and vote "Present." I appreciate that I have often voted for revenue bills in which I did not agree to all the provisions. No revenue bill ever meets the views of any one man, but in previous revenue bills the party which was in power has always, either by caucus or by rule, or in some way made itself responsible. That leads a man to subject his own individual views to the views of his party, recognizing party responsibility and that only so can there be legislation. In this case there has been no such course. My party does not hold me responsible, and the responsibility is not on it but on the Democratic Party. Consequently, it seems to me that the way in which my own judgment will be best satisfied is simply to vote "Present." On the motion to recommit I shall vote no, as I do not think if recommitted the committee would bring out a bill which would be any better.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, is the committee proceeding by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, we were kept up until 1 o'clock this morning in order that we might get the benefit of the oratory of gentlemen who wanted to talk. Now, I am going to suggest that this procedure is standing in the way of the food-control legislation. The people are concerned a great deal more about this than they are about speech making, and I am going to serve notice that if this course is pursued I will object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to state to the gentleman that there are some amendments pending under the five-minute rule. Of course, the committee can close debate at any time it wishes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, what is before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], and also the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. DOWELL. Has debate been exhausted on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. DOWELL. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the striking out of section 504, that makes necessary five amendments. I ask unanimous consent that they may be offered and voted upon en bloc.

Mr. MANN. I understand that the gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that he may offer all of these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. In gross.

Mr. MANN. It would not be in order to offer them at all, except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to offer these amendments and have them voted on in gross. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, line 14, change the section number of the new life insurance section from "505" to "504."

On page 25, line 6, strike out the figure "506" and insert the figure "505."

On page 25, lines 7, 8, and 9, strike out the following: "receiving any payment for advertising or advertising space upon which a tax is imposed by section 504, or"

On page 25, line 11, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "four."

On page 51, after line 12, strike out the new section 1107 agreed to yesterday and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 1107. That (a) if any person, corporation, partnership, or association has, prior to May 9, 1917, made a bona fide contract with a dealer for the sale, after the tax takes effect, of any article (or, in the case of moving picture films, such a contract with a dealer, exchange, or exhibitor, for the sale or lease thereof) upon which a tax is imposed under Title III, IV, VI, or X, or under subdivision 13 of Schedule A of Title VIII, or under this section, and (b) if such contract does not permit the adding of the whole of such tax to the amount to be paid under such contract, then the vendee or lessee shall, in lieu of the vendor or lessor, pay so much of such tax as is not so permitted to be added to the contract price.

"The taxes payable by the vendee or lessee under this section shall be paid to the vendor or lessor at the time the sale or least is consummated, and collected, returned, and paid to the United States by such vendor or lessor in the same manner as provided in section 503.

"The term 'dealer,' as used in this section, includes a vendee who purchases any article with intent to use it in the manufacture or production of another article intended for sale."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in view of some things that have been said this morning with respect to the Ways and Means Committee and the presentation of this bill, I desire to have some matters of record. The gentleman from Tennessee has indicated that the committee is made up of 2 business men and 21 lawyers, which is an error—the other 21 are not all lawyers. I presume the gentleman desired to be lenient with the committee that brought in this great bill, seeing it had a very difficult task to perform. I sympathize with the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I happen to be a member, and realize that it is subject to criticism, although I can not personally find fault with it. I simply regret that in all things I could not agree with the majority of the committee. I purposely reserved my rights as a member of the committee to offer amendments and to say a few things with respect to this bill. Like most Members of the House, and I am sure like many members of the committee, I am not satisfied with the provisions of this bill. Personally, I do not believe it is an equitable bill. I do not believe the distribution of the burden of taxation as herein provided is fair. That is the principal reason I have hesitated to fully support the measure, although I have done everything I could to hasten its passage as a war measure. For the benefit of my friends on this side of the House, as well as to have it known to my friends on the Democratic side, I shall state briefly why a Representative coming from a great industrial center may have reason to hesitate to support a bill of this kind. It is not a question of loyalty; it is a question of the square deal to American citizens who have to sustain the war.

Assuming from the beginning that it was necessary to raise $1,800,000,000, I have been ready to support a measure for that sum that might fairly distribute the burden amongst the people. Such a measure is due by Congress to the people and to the President of the United States, because of our declaration of war, and because of our other crucial vote directing a conscription of the life and blood of the country for war purposes. Coming from an industrial section, however, and I hope I am not to be charged with sectionalism for using that term, I may be excused for having some doubt about the propriety of voting for this measure, and for entertaining the hope that it may be improved upon, even if it shall go to another body. What are the facts as to the present internal taxes of the United States?

The aggregate of all internal revenue collected up to June 30, 1916, was $517,723,000. Bear those figures in mind. Of that amount substantially one-half, or $236,000,000, was paid not by the 48 States of the Union but by just 4 States of the Union. New York paid $104,000,000; Illinois paid $65,000,000; Pennsylvania paid $44,000,000; and Ohio $33,000,000, or a total of $236,000,000—4 States out of a total of 48 States.

As to the income tax alone, what was the amount collected for the year ending June 30, 1916? A total of $67,943,000. What States paid that tax? Illinois paid over $5,000,000, Massachusetts paid over $4,000,000, New Jersey paid nearly $3,000,000—and let me say that that little State along the Atlantic seaboard, being a great industrial State, paid as much as 15 other States whose special products have been exempted from taxation by this bill, New York paid $30,000,000, Ohio more than $2,000,000, and Pennsylvania over $6,000,000—a total of $51,000,000, paid by 6 States, as against a total of $67,000,000 paid by 48 States. As taxes will be doubled and in some instances trebled by the new rates imposed by this bill, the inequality of the burden as to a few of the States is apparent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if some one should ask whether I am loyal to the committee of which I am a member in bringing these facts to the attention of the House, I might say that while I have sat patiently with the committee, doing what I could to further a bill to raise $1,800,000,000, to keep the faith as the Congress, suggestions made by me looking to a more equitable distribution of the tax burden have not been heeded. The majority of the committee decided to close its recommendation with the bill it presented; it did what, in the light of the information before it, was thought by the majority to be reasonable and just.

These facts I venture to present to the House. They may have weight with Members who come from industrial sections, whose constituents will be heavily taxed, and they may also be considered by those who, in determining whether this bill shall stand, may be willing to adjust these seeming inequalities in taxation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the declaration of war with sincere regret, for I voted for that declaration of war realizing what it meant—perhaps not fully realizing what it meant, for possibly we do not any of us yet fully recognize the extent and duration of the struggle in which we are engaged. But I knew it meant vast expenditures, I knew it meant that there must be great and vexatious burdens placed upon the people of the country. When I voted for the declaration of war I assumed the responsibility of voting for the legislation that would become necessary in the laying of that burden. To-day the easy thing to do would be to vote against the bill. The comfortable thing to-day would be to vote against the bill. I could go then home and say to those of my constituents who are objecting to one feature or another of this bill, I could say to them, I voted against the bill, and that would be the comfortable thing to do. But I could not do that and square my act with what I believe to be my duty. I do not like the bill. If this were a time of peace, I would not as a Republican think for a moment of voting for a bill like this. It violates the principles of taxation as I understand those principles as a Republican, but these are not times of peace; these are times of stress and times of war. The committee has done its best. I do not think its work reflects as much credit as I wish it did on its members, but they have worked faithfully. The House day after day has discussed amendments and voted upon them. My opinion is that the House has not greatly improved the bill. In some respects I think it is not as good a bill as it was when the committee reported it. I had hoped to see the bill improved in the House. Unfortunately it has not been improved in some respects at least; but whatever it is and whatever it contains, it is the product of the committee of this House charged with responsibiliy in these matters, and it is the product of this House, whether it be good or bad. Believing the bill can be greatly improved and that the committee can, if given the opportunity, greatly improve it, I shall vote to recommit the bill to the committee, and if that vote shall fail I propose as an earnest of my intention to support this war to vote for the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I am in receipt of a communication from Mr. John C. Kelly, manager of the Sioux City Tribune, of Sioux City, Iowa, voicing a protest against the levying of additional taxes upon the newspapers. His protest is clear, concise, and logical, and I incorporate it herewith as a part of my remarks:

THE SIOUX CITY TRIBUNE,
Sioux City, Iowa, May 14, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES H. DILLON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I realize that the Government of the United States must be supported by taxation, and that it is now engaged in a vitally important enterprise which calls for extraordinary levies. I am one of those willing to pay my share. I have never fought a tax levy or sought to evade a tax laid on me or anything with which I am connected. But the newspaper business is very hard hit in this pending revenue bill; I might better say the provincial newspapers. The metropolitan papers are, comparatively, uninterested. You may have heard in the last few months of the distress of newspapers over the increase in the cost of the paper they use. I want to state my own case pointedly and exactly to you to illustrate this.

I bought paper for my 1916 supply—2,000 tons, at $38 a ton, making $76,000 my investment for the raw material in my business for that year. My business was adjusted to that ratio of cost. The price had been about $38 a ton for years. At the expiration of my contract I had to pay $110 a ton for paper, an increase on my annual paper cost from $76,000 to $220,000—a net increase of $144,000. I wrote to every mill in this western country and Canada for a supply, but they all replied that they had none to sell, and in spite of the high price we have been hard put to it to get a supply.

Some newspapers are still receiving paper on contract and are doing better than the open market enables me to do, but all except those owning their own mill are harrassed. The mills will not make new contracts.

The Federal Trade Commission decided that 2½ cents a pound, $50 a ton, was a reasonable price for the manufacturers to charge, but no manufacturer is selling paper at that price, except, possibly, on some unexpired contracts. The best price on the market now is 4 cents a pound—$80 a ton. At this rate the cost of paper to operate the Sioux City Tribune is $84,000 a year more than it was last year when I bought paper at $38 a ton. It seems impossible to meet an additional burden such as this revenue bill proposes.

The Sioux City Tribune paid the Post Office Department last year more than $23,000 for its second-class mail service. This bill proposes to make the charge for the same service $46,000 and to add 5 per cent tax to the advertising income of the paper.

The increased cost of paper and this post-office charge together will destroy the outside circulation of newspapers, destroy the service now made to the villagers and farmers of the Middle West in particular, and therefore it will not produce the additional revenue hoped for.

I think the Postmaster General clearly in error if he expects to raise a considerable amount of revenue from the daily newspapers by this doubling of the charge upon them. The metropolitan dailies with their large circulations are mostly city affairs. Newspapers like the Philadelphia Bulletin, the Chicago News, the Washington Star, and most other daily newspapers of large circulation in large cities send comparatively few papers by post direct to subscribers. Nearly three-quarters of the circulation of Sioux City newspapers goes to the farmers and villagers of this section, affording them prompt market information and close connection with governmental and world affairs. It is important to them and to the Government that they should have such connection. This is the kind of service that the Government sought to obtain originally by an encouraging mail rate.

These farmers and villagers subscribe for their papers and pay for them a year in advance, and we can not shift the proposed increased burden upon them, if we wished to, inside of a year.

It is different with the metropolitan newspapers. They sell their output daily for cash to agents and distribute to them in bundles, mostly delivered by private conveyance. They use the post office but little except for "single wrappers," which may be sent to absent citizens or old subscribers who have moved away, or something of that kind. When they send to suburbs they also send in bundles to their agents, and if they use the post office for this transportation, presumably they will not use it as soon as the rate shall be doubled, because the express companies now take these bundles where they can give equal service at a lower rate than the Post Office Department rate. What is true of Sioux City daily newspapers is relatively true of the small daily newspapers all through the West.

The American Newspaper Publishers' Association, representing the daily newspapers of the country, have accepted in an official way the zone system as a principle upon which to charge for post-office distribution on second-class mail. This system, if applied, will enable the Post Office Department to collect an adequate price for the larger service it renders to national weeklies and magazines and to determine from experience the effect upon its revenues and the magazine publishing business. Magazines may be combined and reduced in number possibly to the advantage of publishers and public. Not so with daily newspapers in smaller centers.

I am perfectly willing to pay a profit tax or an income tax, but I do protest earnestly against the imposition of this additional postage charge upon daily newspapers at the present time. The zone system ought to be tried before the ruin of daily newspapers shall be decreed.

Newspaper publishers insist that the service rendered them in the combined first and second parcel-post zones is adequately paid for by the present rate of 1 cent a pound. Publishers wanting a service outside this zone may justly be asked to pay for it before the first-zone charge is increased to those using only the smaller service.

I know you will give this matter your earnest consideration, and I will be very glad, if you desire any further information, to furnish any that I can command. Thanking you, I am,

Very truly, yours,

JOHN C. KELLY, Editor.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I realize that to many of us the question of what our action shall be with reference to this bill is a matter of very serious thought and grave concern. I have made up my mind as to my personal course of action.

I realize fully the demands which a foreign war makes upon the country. At the same time I feel that there is no occasion for hysterical haste in traversing the ordinary paths of legislation in raising revenue. I feel that while the House has the right to originate matters of revenue, but it does not rest with the House to finally determine what those revenue matters shall be, that it is an act of joint legislative power. And I think therefore that the question of final decision for each one of us as to whether one shall cast his vote for or against this bill does not press upon us until the bill is here, after senatorial action, for final action on our part.

You may vote to-day to recommit this bill, you may vote to-day in opposition to this bill, without putting yourself in opposition to war or any war measures whatsoever. When the bill goes to the Senate and that coordinate branch of the Government shall have acted, it will come back again to this House, and then the question of our final action will press itself with greater earnestness upon our attention. But in this intermediate stage I have no hesitation whatever in voicing my protest against the bill by a vote in the negative when the question of its passage comes up. [Applause.]

And I do that on three grounds. First, because I do not agree with the general policy that is behind this bill. I do not believe in a 50 per cent basis for financing this war. I do not think the American people, who must shed the blood of this generation, are called upon to pay 50 per cent of the cost of the war out of taxes and at the same time bear all the other burdens of the war. I think 25 per cent or 30 per cent would be equitable enough, and the balance can easily be financed, for this is a war for humanity and liberty, and it reaches in its effects down to the remotest generations to come. And they, at least, can bear a part of the financial burden which this war imposes.

I am opposed to the principle of retroactive taxation that is in this bill. When a man has settled with the Government and received his receipt of payment in full, it is a species of dishonesty to go back and say, "You must pay 33⅓ per cent of what you paid last year as your income tax to the Government."

I am opposed, in the third place, to this bill because of its inequities and inequalities, which may yet be tempered and corrected, in which case I will then face the paramount question on final action of "What shall I do with this measure? Shall I then vote for or against it?" But to-day, my friends, your position, if you do not approve of this bill, is to stand manfully in your place and vote against it. Do not be betrayed by the argument that this is a war measure and war has been declared, and that therefore you must vote immediately for the payment of the expenses of the war. You will have ample opportunity and ample time to do this in the days that are to come.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have an extension of time of one minute for me to ask him a question.

Mr. RUCKER. Make it two minutes, that I may ask him one. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I understand this is two minutes for cross-examination.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any hope that if this bill is defeated in the House or recommitted with or without instructions to the Committee on Ways and Means that we will get a better one? And as we only can originate revenue bills, is it not wiser to send it to the Senate and let it be settled in conference?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Of course we can get a better one. The Committee on Ways and Means is wiser to-day than they were when they framed this measure.

Mr. RUCKER. If a majority of this House votes as the gentleman recommends they vote, how will the bill ever get to the Senate? [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The committee will report it back to the House with proper amendment, correcting some of these evils, and taking time enough to make corrections of inequalities that are in the measure as it stands.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the gentleman to say that he will vote against it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. At this stage I certainly will.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The pending amendments are not being discussed. All that has been said is in the nature of general debate, and we have had exceedingly liberal general debate. And I shall make the point of order that gentlemen must discuss the amendments from this time on, after the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] has been heard. Gentlemen must confine themselves to the amendments. If they want to abuse this bill, they have had plenty of time and a good opportunity in which to do it.

Mr. KITCHIN. If I can stand abuse of the bill, and the other members of the Ways and Means Committee can do so, my friend from Tennessee ought to stand it.

Mr. SIMS. The talking Members of this House have had all the time they need. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] is recognized.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I will not take up much of the time of the House. It is my desire to speak but briefly. There seems to be a concerted effort to discredit this bill just prior to the time when the vote is to be taken, in order to induce a large per cent of the membership of this House to vote against it. There seems to be some influence behind this movement to discredit it for some particular purpose.

I have been reading for the last day or two editorials from a prominent Washington paper denouncing the bill, saying it ought to be defeated and that revenue ought to be raised by a bond issue. I am opposed to the entire revenues for the purposes of this war being raised by levying the burden upon future generations. [Applause.] A fair per cent ought to be borne by the present generation. I have heard it repeatedly said that this bill will disturb business, and that some business concerns will not be able to live if it becomes a law.

I have heard that within a given length of time 75 per cent or more of merchants fail. It is possible that if this great measure is passed there may be now and then some business concern that will go down. The same argument might be urged against the war, that we should not carry on the war because some boy or man may go to his death. [Applause.] But the war is on. Conscription has been ordered. Preparation is under way throughout the country. By a unanimous vote this House has declared in favor of a tremendous bond issue, as large, perhaps, as the country can absorb at this time.

I have no patience with the concerted effort to discredit this, in my judgment, great measure, worthy of approbation as a whole rather than of criticism simply because here and there there may be some objectionable items in it. I have no patience with a man like my distinguished personal friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, who continually appeals to sectional prejudices, with the idea that where wealth is, it will bear a large proportion of tax, and seeks to direct the attention of this House to the fact that concentrated wealth in certain localities will bear a larger share of the burdens than some large sections of the country. I know in one section of Missouri, one county in a district, represented by one of my colleagues, where it is said that in one year $30,000,000 is taken out and earned by men living beyond the borders of the State of Missouri.

I know of and have heard it said that there is one citizen in New York—an ex-Senator of the United States—who has built a mansion at a cost of $7,000,000, a man in wealth equal almost to Rockefeller himself, who has earned almost all he has in Montana and other States than New York, but receives his income in the city of New York, of which he is now a citizen. So with other great wealthy men who reap their wealth from all sections of the country, but have their residences in the cities of their selection. My friend from Pennsylvania will point to the fact that the revenues are paid there, although they are collected from every section of the country.

This is a great bill. We have conscripted the young men to go to Europe to fight the battles of this country, for this Government, and we are conscripting in a reasonable degree a fair share of the incomes and not the principal from the wealth of the country to help bear the burdens of this war. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the regular order?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the regular order?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has been exhausted, of course, on this motion to insert these amendments offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not the regular order to vote upon the motion made by the gentleman from North Carolina?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; unless another amendment is offered to the amendments.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota is recognized, having moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill. [Applause.] I shall vote for it for some of the very same reasons that, as they have stated, impel the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] to vote against the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that the gentleman will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. SIMS. This thing has no end to it, except simply by tolerance, and any other motion will be open to it.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the amendment has been offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] or that it has been necessary to offer the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Does the Chair refuse to rule on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not refuse. Trusting in the well-known charity and good nature of the gentleman from Tennessee, the Chair hopes the gentleman will not insist on his point of order. The gentleman from North Dakota is discussing a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. SIMS. But he is not confining himself to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will request the gentleman from North Dakota to stick to his motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. NORTON. I regret very much that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] offered the amendment to strike out section 504 of this bill, and the adoption of which necessitates the amendments he has now submitted. The striking out of section 504 takes from the bill a source of revenue which I believe should have been left in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. What objection has the gentleman to the last word remaining in this act? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTON. If the gentleman will take his seat, I will tell him.

Mr. SIMS. Then confine yourself to the amendment.

Mr. NORTON. The underlying principle of this bill is, as I understand it, that at least 50 per cent of the revenue needed to carry on this war shall be raised by taxes levied upon the property of this country. I believe such to be a sound and wise policy. We are now engaged in a tremendous and terrible war. From the very nature of war as it continues our people will be obliged to endure many hardships and overcome many difficulties. We should now at this time face squarely the problems before us and begin to do our just share of carrying the heavy burdens of this war.

I firmly believe that if we adopt a policy of paying out of revenues collected 50 per cent or more of the actual expenses of this war it will be the best policy for all our people and will be a policy that will tend to shorten the period of the war. It is a policy that will bring to this Nation the day of peace much sooner than will the adoption of the policy of letting future generations in the country pay the greater share of the expenses of the war.

A great many gentlemen here are desirous of issuing bonds to cover practically all the expenses of the war. I believe that to be an unwise and bad policy for this country to adopt. It would result in dangerous inflation of the finances of the country. It would result in disastrous inflation of business. While under such a policy we might have seemingly joyous and prosperous times for a year or two, it would unquestionably leave the country in a most disastrous financial condition after the war. The brave and patriotic men who established this Nation in the days of the Revolutionary War proposed no such pusillanimous proposition as to leave 75 or 80 per cent of the cost of that war to be paid by future generations. They were strong, courageous men. They were men willing to make the sacrifices that were at the time necessary to be made. They were not asking generations then unborn to carry their burdens. We here would do well to take a lesson from them in this matter. The people of this Nation who are well able to do so should pay the expenses of this war as they are incurred.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. HELVERING. The policy of selling many bonds was tried in the Civil War, and it was found to be a failure, was it not?

Mr. NORTON. Yes. It proved to be a bad policy then, and unless very much restricted will prove a bad policy in this war. It is simply this kind of policy: A willingness to leave as many burdens and difficulties for future generations as possible and a cringing from meeting our own problems as we ought to meet them. It is regrettable, but the fact is that there are thousands of men in this country to-day whose only desires are to accumulate great riches as the result of this war. I believe, gentlemen, that we have resources enough in this country to pay every dollar of the expenses of this war as they are incurred if we conduct the business of the country properly and wisely. We have property in this country of the value of more than $200,000,000,000. If during this war all our citizens are employed as they should be only a small part of the profits of our invested capital and labor will be needed to meet all the expenses of this war.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. What part of this $250,000,000,000 resources of the United States does the gentleman think we ought to expend in this war?

Mr. NORTON. As I have stated, it would be necessary to expend but a small part of the annual net income of the Nation to meet our war expenses. As shown by this statement, which I shall insert in the RECORD, the annual income of this Nation is $33,600,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. On the amendment to strike out the last word?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] wants a little time, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] ought to have a little time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not want any time now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri wants time.

Mr. MANN. A great many men want time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Wisconsin ought to have five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Objection has been made.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to this request. I have waited here four or five days for a chance to speak.

Mr. MANN. I move that all debate on the pending amendment be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on the pending amendment be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, yesterday when we had under consideration the amendment offered by the committee with respect to the tariff provision section, there were added several amendments, one by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and one by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he send up his amendment and have it reported, and then explain it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I wanted to see if we could get unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. Let us have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 47, line 24, after the period, insert the following as a substitute for the section agreed to yesterday:

This section shall not apply——

Mr. MANN. Is that a new section?

Mr. KITCHIN. It refers to the war-tariff provision section.

Mr. MANN. It is reported as a section in place of a section agreed to yesterday. I know what it is, but is it intended as a new section?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is a——

Mr. MANN. I know what the gentleman is offering, but the Clerk has read it as a substitute for a section agreed to yesterday. That would cover the whole section.

Mr. KITCHIN. I say as a substitute for the amendments to that section.

Mr. MANN. Well, let it be reported and see what it says.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 47, line 24, after the period, insert the following:

"This section shall not apply to (a) gold or silver bullion; (b) coins of gold, silver, copper, or other metals; (c) printing paper admitted free of duty under paragraph 567 of section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' approved October 3, 1913, as amended; (d) ores of the platinum metals, and platinum, unmanufactured or in ingots, bars, plates, sheets, wire, sponge, or scrap, and vases, retorts, and other apparatus, vessels and parts thereof composed of platinum for chemical uses; (e) nitrate of soda; (f) mechanical ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, unbleached or bleached, and rag pulp; or (g) articles specificed in paragraphs 397, 398, 404, 424, 428, 451, 499, 556, 582, and 642 of section 1 of such act of October 3, 1913."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to consider this amendment in lieu of the amendment adopted yesterday.

Mr. MANN. To offer this.

Mr. KITCHIN. To offer this.

The CHAIRMAN. As a substitute for the amendment agreed to yesterday.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will say that this does not change the substance——

Mr. KITCHIN. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. But only changes the form, so as to make it euphonious, there being several amendments to it——

Mr. KITCHIN. That is all.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object, if we can have an agreement that debate on the amendment shall not exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment shall not exceed 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman couples with his request the further request that debate on this amendment shall not exceed 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the adoption of these amendments, but I shall vote for a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means in the hope and belief that further exceptions will be made to this tariff clause. I shall vote to recommit it for another reason. I have more confidence in the Committee on Ways and Means than they seem to have in themselves, for I believe that if this bill is recommitted to the committee they will not have serious difficulty in bringing to the House a very much better bill than we are now called upon to vote upon.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Just for a question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think these statements that are made here are entirely fair. There has been no evidence that any member of the Ways and Means Committee has changed his opinion as to any of the provisions in this bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no. What I meant by that statement was that the Committee on Ways and Means when they reported this bill evidently believed it was the best bill they could report, while now I believe they could improve the bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, it must be remembered that the House, under the rule that our Democratic friends have adopted, have not had the opportunity of really perfecting this bill. It has not had the opportunity of adding any new sources of taxation, which I believe ought to be done.

But if this motion to recommit shall fail, I shall then vote for the bill for the reason suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. In voting upon this bill and upon every bill I believe that every Member in deciding his vote should test it by this proposition: How would I vote if my vote defeated the bill or was necessary to pass it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I can not take the responsibility of perchance my vote, if the House refuses to recommit the bill—of having my vote say that this bill shall not go out from this House, and by that vote say that the House of Representatives is refusing to vote money to carry on this war. [Applause.] I am not willing, so far as my vote is concerned, to have the enemies of this country across the sea regard that vote as an expression that the United States is not going to use all its resources as it has pledged to do in its declaration to win this war.

It has been said that we will have another opportunity later on to vote for a better bill; but if this bill should be defeated, how will the House ever get that opportunity? If the House refuses to recommit the bill and it is killed, that is the end of it. The country would be justified, and the world would be justified in assuming that the House of Representatives does not propose to raise one dollar in addition to that which is now provided to carry on the greatest war in our history. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the bill, but I do hope that the motion to recommit may prevail, because I am satisfied that without great loss of time we would have before us a very much better bill than is now embodied in the one we are called upon to vote upon. [Applause.]

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit some few observations upon this measure. I do not enthuse upon the bill any more perhaps than some other Members of the House, but I am going to vote for it. I was one of the Members who voted against the declaration of war. I had hoped and prayed that this glorious Nation of ours would escape this terrible conflict into which we have been drawn, but, gentlemen, we have passed that point. We are at war with a great military country. There are no "ifs" and "ands" about that; and, being at war, it occurs to me that every American citizen worthy the name ought to be willing to make any and every sacrifice necessary to bring this war to a speedy and successful conclusion. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] a few moments ago said that this bill was constructed upon sectional lines; that it was not equitably and evenly balanced; that the burdens were not justly apportioned. Let me say to you that you can hope for little equity and fairness and justice to flow from a condition of war. We can not therefore hold up proceedings of this character and fail to make the necessary preparations to prosecute this war until everybody is content with reference to the tax burdens. [Applause.]

Through my section of the country there are corporations, mining corporations as well as others, the stockholders of which, in the main, reside in the East. These corporations within the last few years, especially since this war has been in progress, have made great profits. Now, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania contend that merely because these stockholders and officers reside in the East, notwithstanding the wealth is produced in my State, that legislation is sectional which requires them to contribute a fair portion of their profits for a cause of this character in this great crisis in our country's history? Many of you gentlemen voted for the declaration of war, and you voted to conscript the boys of the country and send them to the trenches of Europe; and now when you are asked to conscript the wealth, the dollar, you balk and refuse to do it, declaring that you will not vote for this bill merely because it takes a small percentage more of the wealth of those who possess the wealth than you think it should. Do you contend that money is more sacred than the lives of our boys? And did you not know when you voted the declaration of war that it meant not only the sacrifice of thousands of lives upon the altar of our country but that it would require wealth to prosecute it? Think for a moment, gentlemen, of our boys on the battle line when they are ordered to go forward in the face of shot and shell, where it means that great numbers of them will be mowed down and their lives sniffed out for their country, leaving their loved ones at home to grieve their untimely deaths. They can not argue the difference between a 10 per cent risk and a 100 per cent risk of their lives; they must be willing to make the supreme sacrifice, yet you argue percentages and the effect this bill may have upon the rich of the land. We recently passed the conscription bill which means that the boys between the ages of 21 and 30 years are to be conscripted and sent to the trenches of Europe, and now for Members of this House to stand here and advocate that the wealth of the country escape the burdens of the war is to me the most ridiculous and unfortunate attitude they can assume. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] on yesterday related a conversation which he had had with some publisher. This publisher plead with the gentleman from Pennsylvania to vote against the increased tax upon second-class mail matter, declaring that he was willing that the Government take all of his profits, but "for God's sake leave him his capital." The men who are fighting this battle and who will be required to fight it can not conserve their capital. They are exposing their breasts to all the dangers of war. The further thought came to me on yesterday, as it occurs to me now, that throughout this broad land of ours, when the boys affected by the conscript law are taken from their homes and their loved ones, that the fathers and the mothers no doubt would gladly say to the officers, if they were given that option, "Take my profits—not only my profits, but take all of my capital—but for God's sake leave me my boy and do not send him to the trenches of Europe." [Applause.] But we can not do that. We must send the boys, for there is no turning back now since we are in this war; and I say shame on the man who is so wedded to the interests and those who are getting big profits out of their businesses that he now will hesitate not only to contribute his profits but his very capital to sustain the flag of our country and to preserve the liberties and the glories of our Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I want the shortest possible time to elapse between now and the termination of this horrible affair. I want just as few of the boys of the country sacrificed as is possible. Let us, therefore, have the patriotism, the courage, and the manhood to do the true and noble thing. Let us not require the poor boys of the land to do the fighting and then also require them to do the paying if they escape the supreme sacrifice for their country. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 51, add a new section after the new section 1107, as follows: "SEC. 1108. That in the payment of any tax under this act the fractional part of a cent shall be disregarded, unless it amounts to one-half a cent or more, in which case it shall be increased to 1 cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to offer the amendment just reported.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, how many more amendments has the gentleman from North Carolina to offer perfecting the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. One more after this.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will couple with that a request that the amendment shall be voted on without debate, as it speaks for itself, I shall not object.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be voted on without debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman couples with his former request the request that it shall be voted on without debate. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to offer a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 19, line 24, strike out the word "advertising."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I shall object to the request unless the debate is closed before it begins. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that it be voted on without debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to offer the amendment and that it be voted on without debate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I did want about five minutes myself, but under the circumstances I will not make the request. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KITCHIN rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman begins will he yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to an article appearing in the Greensboro News, of Greensboro, N. C., dated May 22, 1917, accredited by the paper to its Washington correspondent. The headlines read:

President Wilson is against revenue bill as drafted by House—Quoted as saying it is a vicious piece of legislation—Devolves upon Senator SIMMONS to redraft the revenue bill in the Senate.

The article goes on and states:

It is said upon high authority that word has gone out from the White House that President Wilson will veto the revenue bill should it be passed by Congress as drafted by the House. In fact, the President is quoted as saying to three Republican Senators who conferred with him a few days ago that the House bill was the most vicious piece of legislation ever attempted by Congress.

I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to the statement and to ask if he knows the views of the administration, and whether the administration is correctly quoted?

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish to say to the gentleman that my attention was called to that article yesterday, and I at once called it to the attention of the President. There is not a shadow of foundation for that statement which the gentleman has quoted, and I am authorized by the President to say that it is absolutely false. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have been struck with profound surprise and amazement to see gentlemen one after another rise here today, just before the vote is to be taken upon this important measure, knowing that the Government is in urgent need of money with which to prosecute the war against the greatest military power on earth, and declare to the country and to the world that they will not support the bill which proposes to raise that money. Some give one excuse and some another. They say they can not vote for it because the bill is against their principles; because it has in it inequalities, inequities; because it taxes some industries in some States and does not tax certain industries in other States. Mr. Speaker, there never was a war-tax bill enacted in this country or in any other country that did not apparently have inequalities, that did not have in it some inequities, that did not tax some industries in some States or sections while certain industries in other sections or States were not taxed. In the nature of things this must be. If we tax incomes, the States having more and larger incomes will pay more than the States with fewer and smaller incomes. If we tax luxuries and not the necessities of life, the industries producing the luxuries are taxed while the industries producing the necessities of life are not. If whisky distilling is taxed and whisky is distilled in Illinois and not in Virginia, then an Illinois industry is taxed and a Virginia industry is not. If tobacco is taxed and North Carolina manufactures tobacco and Wisconsin does not, then a North Carolina industry is taxed and a Wisconsin industry is not. It is impossible to write a bill that will produce $1,800,000,000, or even much less, as a war measure and not have such results. Two internal-revenue bills were passed by Congress during the Civil War. I commend their reading to the gentlemen who propose to vote against this bill and their comparison with this bill. They taxed every single article that is taxed in this bill except automobiles. There were no automobiles in those days, but there were carriages, and they taxed the carriages. They taxed hundreds of articles that are not taxed in this bill. They taxed railroad bonds and railroad irons and compelled the railroads to pay 3 per cent of their gross receipts from passenger fares, and in 1864 taxed them on the gross receipts for transportation of both passengers and property. They taxed express and telegraph companies on their receipts. They taxed hotels and boarding houses. They taxed the slaughtering of hogs and of cattle. They taxed all boots, shoes, and other articles of leather. They taxed the manufacture of wool and cotton and silk, of iron and lead, and almost everything in the category of taxation. Men came here then, as they do now, and protested against those measures. They claimed there were inequalities and inequities in the bills; that their industries were taxed and other industries were not; that one section or State was taxed and another section or State was not. They prophesied ruin and disaster to their industries, as they do now, and there were Representatives in this House then who made the same arguments, the same protests, the same prophecies as we have heard in this debate. But, Mr. Speaker, as I have said before in this debate, there were men patriotic enough, courageous enough, men with statesmanship enough in those days to feel in their hearts and souls that their first duty and their best loyalty was to their country and their Government in that hour of her trial and danger. [Applause.] And in spite of opposition and protests and prophecies inside and outside of Congress those measures were passed, and the Government was thereby enabled to raise and maintain an army that destroyed the Confederacy.

Gentlemen contend that we ought to issue more bonds; that we ought not to tax the people. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], as well as others, have said that not more than 20 or 25 or certainly not more than 30 per cent of the expenses of the war should be raised by taxes, and the balance should be raised by bonds. Have gentlemen forgotten that on April 14 last we passed the largest bond bill ever authorized at one time by any nation? We then authorized a bond issue of $5,000,000,000 and the issue of $2,000,000,000 additional of certificates of indebtedness—four times more money than this revenue bill proposes to levy, and the $5,000,000,000 of bonds, outside of the certificates of indebtedness, are nearly three times the amount that we propose to raise in this measure. My friends, why can you not have the same patriotic and sacrificial spirit to-day when we are about to vote upon a measure that is going to tax ourselves, a measure that is going to impose a burden upon us, as you exhibited on April 14, when you put a burden of over $5,000,000,000 upon your children and upon your children's children without a single dissenting vote—unanimously? Why were you so generous in imposing burdens on future generations and now so selfish as to refuse to impose any burden on yourselves and your generation? Can you feel good over that? Will your conscience let you rest in the quiet of after life when you reflect that you voted with a cheer to put $5,000,000,000 of burden upon children yet unborn and then when you are asked by your Government to-day to tax yourselves one-third of that amount you stand here before this House, before your country, and before the world and protest against it? It will humiliate and mortify your children after you when they read that you, amid great hurrahs, voted that this Nation should enter the European war, and that the first step taken afterwards you voted, amid great cheers, for a debt of $5,000,000,000 for your children to pay to carry on the war, and the very first time your country asked you to do something yourselves, to make some sacrifice, to take something out of your own pockets, you got up on this floor, in the presence of your country and the world, and protested against making a single sacrifice or paying a single dollar or allowing an industry in your State or district to pay a single dollar. [Applause.]

It is not patriotism, it is not statesmanship; ah, my friends, it is not manliness. I would feel a miserable coward were I willing to impose a burden upon my children and upon my children's children to carry on a war with which they had nothing to do and in which they had no voice, and then refuse to pay out of my income or property a dollar of tax to prosecute that war which I helped to bring on. [Applause.]

I was in hopes that the world would look upon this splendid body of American statesmen on this day and witness, when the vote is taken on this measure imposing a burden upon us, the same unanimity as it did upon April 14, when every man answered "aye" to the roll call on a measure imposing a burden on others. I trust now that the gentlemen who have heretofore made up their minds to vote against this measure will reconsider, and that not a vote will be cast against it.

My friends, there was divided opinion among us as to whether or not the United States should enter the European war. Some of us opposed it. Most of us favored it. But since the Nation, through the Congress, has spoken war, let us show to the world that among us there is no divided loyalty. [Applause.] Let us to-day send the message throughout the earth that, in the execution of the country's command and the country's need, the most stupendous war-tax measure ever presented to a legislative body, as on April 14 the most stupendous bond issue ever proposed at one time in all history, received every single vote of the representatives of the American people. [Applause.]

It becomes us, my countrymen, my colleagues, to let the world know that all our thought, all our wisdom, all our patriotism, all our courage, all our efforts are dedicated in common to the one cause of our country. [Applause.] The impulse, the resolve, in every true American heart, inside and outside this Capitol, should be to make every sacrifice, undergo every suffering, endure every hardship, exert every effort to make sure the quick and complete triumph of his country and thus hasten the day of peace to us and to all mankind. [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the amendments commencing with section 1201, and in that connection I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Arkansas rise?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I demand a separate vote on the automobile amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry with my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The amendment was a committee amendment covering eight sections, I believe. I do not know whether any others were inserted or not. I take it, and I wish to ask now, if it will be in order for me to ask for a division of the question? I wish to ask for a division of the question so as to have a separate vote upon all of the amendments except section 1208, relating to postmasters.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe, if I may express my opinion to the Chair, that that amendment is divisible, and I think the present occupant of the chair ruled expressly on this proposition when the Post Office bill was up, and the Reed amendment was being considered, and ruled that when an amendment was reported from the committee it should be treated as one amendment, even if it contained several propositions, and was not divisible.

Mr. MANN. I would not be worried any about that.

I know that is not correct. This was a motion to strike out and insert, which the rules say is not divisible. Unless I can have a division on it I shall ask for a separate vote on every amendment. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. HELVERING. You desire simply to strike out section 1208, relative to the pay of postmasters, and vote on the balance?

Mr. MANN. I want a separate vote. I do not want to vote against section 1208 in connection with the postmasters, which has nothing to do with the zone system. I want to vote on the zone system by itself. I ask unanimous consent that in voting upon this amendment there may be a vote upon the combined sections 1201 to 1207, inclusive, on one vote.

Mr. CRISP. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a separate vote upon every amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a separate vote on every amendment.

Mr. MANN. If you have a fair chance to vote, I will have it.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman can proceed if he sees fit, and I will do so.

The SPEAKER. Both gentlemen are out of order. There is no debate about it.

The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

First amendment: Page 3 of the bill, line 4, strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "ten."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3 of the bill, line 7, strike out the word "eleven" and insert "13.75."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. The amendment has not been completed yet.

The SPEAKER. Is that all of it?

Mr. MANN. No. That is part of one amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next part.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. To state that in my judgment there is a misunderstanding between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. I do not think the gentleman from Georgia understood the request of the gentleman from Illinois. I think it would be agreed to if it was understood.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the House permit a vote separately on the amendment to section 1201, with the exception of——

Mr. MANN. It is only down to section 1206.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood the gentleman in the excitement of the moment did not want to vote separately on just 1201.

Mr. MANN. No; on 1201 to 1206, inclusive.

Mr. KITCHIN. I asked Judge CRISP to take charge of the matter then, as I had something else on my mind at the time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his demand for a separate vote on every amendment?

Mr. MANN. I do until this matter is adjusted.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I made the objection. I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman draws an exception to the person making the request?

Mr. CRISP. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] wants a separate vote, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] agrees to it, on section 1201 and the succeeding sections down to section 1208.

Mr. MANN. Down to and including section 1206.

The SPEAKER. Down to and including section 1206.

Mr. KITCHIN. That will be just one vote on that proposition?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

Mr. MANN. I want a roll call on that, Mr. Speaker, when we reach it.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IGOE. I would like to ask the Speaker the effect of the adoption of these sections of the substitute. If these sections are voted out, do the sections as in the bill when reported by the committee remain?

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is, if they are not voted out by some substitute.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Missouri is through, let me submit another parliamentary inquiry. If this amendment should be agreed to by a vote of the House, would it not then, as I understand, be in order to make a motion to recommit with directions to the committee to strike it out, it having just been agreed to?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MANN. But if the motion to amend is defeated, it would then be in order on a motion to recommit to instruct the committee to strike out the original language in the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not like to cross bridges until he comes to them.

Mr. MANN. That is not a very difficult bridge.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be; but it would expedite matters to have it cleared up.

Mr. MANN. That has never been settled.

The SPEAKER. You can vote it in. You can not vote it out by a motion to recommit.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this second-class mail business that is in here, but if in voting to eliminate this Kitchin amendment I am voting to retain in the bill something that is in there that is more objectionable to me, I do not want to be put in that position.

Mr. MANN. If we vote this down, you can strike the other out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to section 1201.

Mr. MANN. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the vote might come later. Let us dispose of the things on which we will not have a roll call first.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, there has only been a separate vote demanded on two amendments.

Mr. MANN. I intend to demand a separate vote on one other amendment.

The SPEAKER. You had better do it now.

Mr. MANN. Has this request been agreed to?

The SPEAKER. No. That has not been put. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, I want a separate vote on the Lenroot amendment, making a number of changes in the income-tax feature of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a separate vote on sections 1201 to 1206, inclusive, and also on the Lenroot amendment, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] demands a separate vote on the automobile amendment. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments. Those in favor of the other amendments will say "aye," those opposed "no."

The question was taken, and the amendments referred to were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The other amendments except these three are agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Lenroot amendment, there were several Lenroot amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that we have a vote in the House on all those amendments to the income tax en bloc.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the various amendments on the income-tax proposition be voted on together. Is there objection to that?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The vote now is on section 1201, substituted, down to and including section 1206.

Mr. OLDFIELD. That is the last one, Mr. Speaker, in the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us vote on these now.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor will say "aye"; those opposed "no."

Mr. MANN. What is this on?

Mr. OLDFIELD. That is the last amendment, Mr. Speaker, in the bill.

The SPEAKER. It makes practically little difference about that.

Mr. MANN. What is the vote being taken on?

The SPEAKER. The one that the Chair declared the vote on——

Mr. MANN. The zone system?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Twelve hundred and one to twelve hundred and six, both inclusive.

Mr. MANN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I ask that these amendments be voted on in the order in which they were put in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first one.

The CLERK. The income-tax amendment, pages 3 and 4 of the bill.

Until further notice:

Mr. FLYNN with Mr. HULL of Iowa.

Mr. MARTIN of Illinois with Mr. HAYES.

Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. WOOD of Indiana.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on the amendment comprising sections 1201 down to and including section 1206.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under the rule of recognition which the Speaker has heretofore announced, no member of the Ways and Means Committee having announced that he would vote against the bill, will I be entitled to recognition to move to recommit the bill at the proper stage?

The SPEAKER. With one additional qualification, if the gentleman is opposed to the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman if no member of the Ways and Means Committee moves to recommit.

Mr. MANN. No member of the Ways and Means Committee can qualify.

The SPEAKER. If he can not qualify, he can not make the motion.

Mr. RAINEY. On this amendment I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much confusion in the House that I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Kitchin amendment.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HULBERT. If this amendment be defeated, then the position in which the House will be is precisely the same as though the bill were reported with the original provisions as they were first contained in the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. HULBERT. And in order to strike out those provisions, which this amendment now seeks, in part, to amend, it would be necessary to move to recommit.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that that motion will be made.

Mr. HULBERT. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 257, nays 150, not voting 22, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 24, 1917.

Rev. Edward King Hardin, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, we come to Thee because we realize our need of Thee. We are continually facing tasks and opportunities with which we are utterly unable to cope unless we have power from beyond and above us. But we thank Thee, O Lord, that Thou art ever ready to help, and our hearts are filled with gratitude that we have the privilege of serving a God who is a worker, and whose sympathy is with those who give themselves to the tasks that He has set for men whose hearts are perfect toward Him. And so we pray Thee that we may ever face our work. In the sentiment of that prayer, O Lord, "Establish Thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish Thou it."

We meet together this morning, our Father, in the shadow of death; and we humbly pray that as a comrade and fellow worker falls at our side we may be very conscious of Thee, for we realize that it is then that we are brought face to face with the eternal realities of life. We pray that the comforting presence of God may be realized by his sorrowing loved ones, and that in this hour of their deep sorrow and bereavement the consolations of God may be very large with them.

Hear us in this prayer because we ask it in Christ's name. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore (Mr. SAULSBURY) assumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR HARRY LANE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it becomes my painful duty to announce the death of my colleague, Senator LANE, which occurred in San Francisco last night while on his way to his home. There was no man in Oregon more loved than he, Mr. President, and while his sturdy, rugged honesty, combined with a fearlessness that ignored consequences to himself, brought him in antagonism with some, yet his enemies were few, indeed, as compared with the host of friends he made during his lifelong residence in his native State. He brought to the discharge of every public duty the best that was in him, and no man, however much we might differ from his views on public questions, ever attributed to him other than the most patriotic purposes.

At some later date I shall ask that the ordinary business of the Senate be laid aside in order that proper respect may be paid to his memory. In the meantime I present the following resolutions and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 68) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. HARRY LANE, late a Senator from the State of Oregon.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to take order for superintending and attending the funeral of the late Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed as the committee of Senators under the second resolution Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. KENYON, Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. KING, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. GRONNA, and Mr. NORRIS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 25, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 24, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Touch our hearts, O God our Heavenly Father, with the Holy Spirit of truth, and inspire us to larger life in thought and purpose; that we may be firmly united as a people in the great task before us and count no sacrifice too great in the preservation of the eternal principles that moved our fathers in building for us a government of the people, by the people, for the people; that we may be the instruments in Thy hands for the furtherance of those principles to all the world; that the promise in Holy Writ may be fulfilled in that all the kingdoms of the earth may be swayed by the scepter of infinite love; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE JOSEPH H. CHOATE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] may address the House for 20 minutes relative to the late Joseph H. Choate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the remarks I am about to make would have been more appropriate a week ago, but I realized that the House desired to give close attention to the revenue bill, and I therefore did not ask for time for the purpose I am now using it.

There are few occasions when it is becoming that a public man make personal references. Probably none of us would claim modesty as our chief attribute, but we do have a fair sense of the proprieties. I feel I am not encroaching upon them when I ask at this time the indulgence of the House in a personal reference. I was born and have lived practically all my life in the little village of Stockbridge, amid the hills of western Massachusetts. On Thursday last there was laid at rest there the remains of Joseph Hodges Choate, a man who left a record that will make an impression on American life and history for years to come. For nearly 40 years his vacation time was spent in Stockbridge. He loved its people as they loved him, and no more sincere mourning of a community could be possible than was expressed by my neighbors and friends as they sorrowfully paid a final tribute to him in our village cemetery.

I was a youngster when Mr. Choate first brought his family to Stockbridge, and many a good wholesome play did I have with his boys under his guidance. I can see now the spirited games of "one-o'-cat" on his lawn with him either participant or umpire of the boyish frolics. I can look forward for the noon hour when the reliable family horse was hitched to a big wagon and with him as driver we boys went to the lake for a daily swim. He acted as our instructor and guard that we did not go beyond our depth. I can live over again the happy hours in the evenings when the kindly voice of Mrs. Choate would read to the group of youngsters children's stories or lead in the games we have all enjoyed.

I need not dwell on the events of the years which have elapsed since those days, and I only refer to them here that I may justify the personal feature of my remarks.

During all these years, and amid all the honors that came to him and the reputation he attained in his profession, this country village was his delight and pleasure ground. More than 30 years ago he purchased of David Dudley Field a large tract of land beautifully located on the brow of Prospect Hill, overlooking the winding Housatonic River and the Stockbridge meadows. Here has been developed the ideal country home. Here, excepting the few years he was ambassador to England, he spent more than half of each year in a home the center of social activities and under the hospitable roof of which more people of note of all countries have been entertained than in any similar unofficial residence. His democratic ways not only made him the ideal host of President or ambassador, but likewise the modest workman or local farmer. He knew and called by their first name practically every farmer and workingman in the community.

As an illustration of his community spirit, let me refer to his golden wedding anniversary, on October 16, 1911. On the previous evening a family dinner was served, participated in by his kinsfolk of three generations. On the following day his home was thrown wide open to every man and woman from far and near in the community. We all went and were received by the happy couple with their accustomed courtly grace. Each one was made to feel that he or she was honoring the occasion rather than being honored by being included in the gathering. While there could have been no similar event in the course of his life in Stockbridge, it was but characteristic of his democratic way and friendly spirit toward all of his neighbors.

He was wont to walk from his home, about three-quarters of a mile, to the village post office, wait for the morning New York paper, and while standing about the sidewalk have a cheery word for one and all. He was a leading member of all our village organizations, participated in consideration of local questions, and would always give of his time or money to all our local efforts for village improvements, for charity, for church work; and for the general interest of the town and neighborhood. I need not elaborate on these lovable characteristics of close association and personal interest that he had in our local life.

Let me say but a word of my connection with him in what proved to be his last summer with us. He was intensely interested in the political campaign of 1916. When I happened home for a brief stay he would frequently come to my office or ask me to ride with him that he might ask questions or secure first-handed information of the details of how matters were progressing here in Washington. As the campaign went on his interest increased until finally he consented to preside at a meeting in Pittsfield, where he made a memorable address. One of our colleagues was the speaker, and I know he would agree with me in saying that the speech Mr. Choate delivered that night was a wonderful one.

He commenced in his usual witty way by saying there were about 84 or 85 good reasons why he should not be present. Those 85 reasons were more applicable during the period just prior to his death, when he actively served as head of the citizens' committee of New York appointed by the mayor of that city to personally receive and entertain the French and British commissions when they visited the metropolis. It seemed in glancing over the newspapers that Mr. Choate was with the distinguished visitors continually, speaking two and three times a day, and showing the endurance of a man half his age. His interest and activity, however, on these occasions were so great that he absolutely exhausted his energies, and it may rightly be said that he was one of the first Americans to lay down his life in the allied cause. He had said repeatedly that he was willing to give his all for the great object of humanity and civilization now at stake in the war. In the last few days of his life he seems to have used all that he had in strength and vitality to demonstrate to the distinguished visitors that America is intensely loyal and stands true to the principles outlined by the President.

In view of Mr. Choate's intense partisanship I feel no better illustration of the greatness of his mind could be shown than the compliments he paid and the sincere loyalty he expressed toward President Wilson in the very last speeches he made.

Mr. Choate's home was called Naumkeag, an Indian word, meaning "haven of rest." It was such to him during the many years of his life. Mr. Choate could not be actually restful under any circumstances, but it was a place of rest for him during his busy and active life—well named.

The property slopes gently to the village plain, and at the foot of the hill adjoining the village cemetery another Naumkeag was recently prepared by him. It was there he was tenderly placed as the sun passed beyond the western hills on Thursday afternoon. As the beautiful country home was his haven of rest in life, so this Naumkeag will forever be a haven of rest for the mortal body. The reward for such a life beyond the grave must be immortal rest and perpetual peace.

The Daily News, a newspaper printed in Pittsfield, Mass., editorially published the following reference to the tribute that Stockbridge paid to Mr. Choate, and I desire to read it at this time:

STOCKBRIDGE TRIBUTE TO MR. CHOATE.

Never before within memory of the oldest inhabitant has Stockbridge so honored one of its deceased residents as it did Joseph H. Choate yesterday. An honored, unique, and interesting custom, English in character, was revived of conveying the body to the grave on a farm wagon with the village brass band playing a dirge. With the closing of schools and stores and church bells tolling and with more than 500 men and women present, surely Stockbridge could do no more in paying its final respects to Berkshire County's most distinguished summer resident. The tribute is all the more remarkable when it is recalled that he passed only six months of each year in the town of which he was never a legal resident. In the affection and esteem of young and old among the townspeople, however, he was unsurpassed, and the respect shown his memory was worthy of the best traditions of old Stockbridge.

It seemed especially appropriate that a silk American flag should have been placed at the head of his grave, as it represents and typifies the symbol of democracy and freedom, for which he fought to the very end.

I happened to meet in the corridor of the Capitol on Wednesday last the Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, formerly United States Senator from New York and the intimate associate of Mr. Choate during the greater part of his life. We conversed a few moments about him, and the remarks Mr. Depew made so interested me that I asked him to allow me to use them at this time. His letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 16, 1917.

Hon. ALLEN TOWNER TREADWAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TREADWAY: Following our conversation of this morning about our friend, Mr. Choate, I have known Mr. Choate for nearly a half century and my admiration for his wonderful ability and regard for him increased with the years.

In serious crises in affairs for which I was responsible I retained Mr. Choate, and his advice and efforts always led to success. I had opportunities for comparing him with other leaders of the bar, and he had no equal. He was the most versatile, witty, and eloquent after-dinner speaker and equally superior on the platform in the discussion of political, civic, reform, or humanitarian subjects.

I saw much of him during his six years as an ambassador to Great Britain. His magnetic personality, eloquence, and wit won for him a consideration from the English public, and especially the judges and the bar, rarely accorded to a diplomat. He is the only American lawyer since the formation of our Republic ever elected a Bencher of the Middle Tempie. His epigrams and witticisms were repeated and enjoyed in social circles and country houses all over the Kingdom.

It was his conscientious devotion to duty which was the secret of his success and also largely the cause of his death. As the foremost citizen of New York, he was appointed by the mayor chairman of the city committee to meet and entertain the French and English commissions. It was a laborious place, requiring both work and serious exposure at his age of 85. But he neglected no detail and was seen everywhere and delivered a series of speeches each day, which were perfect in matter and method. A detail of what he did is a remarkable record.

On Wednesday he met Joffre and Viviani at the wharf and rode with them through the streets to Mr. Frick's house in the upper part of the city. He assisted in entertaining them at the dinner at Mr. Frick's that evening. He was with them again Thursday morning and accompanied them to the luncheon of the Merchants' Association, where he made an admirable speech. He dined with them that evening at Sherry's. Friday morning he met Mr. Balfour at the ferry, rode with him in the procession to the city hall, where he made a speech, and then continued with the city's guests in an open automobile the 6 miles through the cheering crowds to Mr. Astor's residence. In the afternoon he accompanied the commission to the open-air ceremony of conferring degrees at Columbia University, and in the evening was with them again at the municipal banquet at the Waldorf-Astoria, where he made one of the best speeches of his long career. Saturday he was their escort to the chamber of commerce lunch, where he made a speech. In the evening he entertained Mr. Balfour at dinner at his own house and afterwards went to the Red Cross entertainment at Carnegie Hall. Sunday morning he escorted the British commissioners to the service at St. John's Cathedral. That afternoon he became ill and passed away a few hours later. These efforts would have taxed the mental and physical vigor of youth.

He has been for two years advocating the joining of our country with France and Great Britain in a war which he believed involved the liberty and civilization of the world. He often said he was willing to give his all for the cause. He accepted the chairmanship of the mayor's committee to emphasize the union of these great powers with the United States in the struggle for the democracy of the world and died for his country.

Yours, sincerely, CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW.

I realize how imperfectly I have described the part of Mr. Choate's life with which I had intimate knowledge. It will be for others to express encomiums on his great public services, genius, and legal knowledge; but, Mr. Speaker, I indeed would have felt myself lacking in gratitude to one of the great men of our Nation had I not asked of my colleagues opportunity of expressing my own feelings of personal loss in the death of Joseph Hodges Choate. [Applause.]

I desire to add brief extracts from speeches Mr. Choate delivered during the last few days of his life.

As chairman of the reception committee to the French visitors on May 10 he said, in an address of welcome:

Our Chief Magistrate at Washington has uttered recently, in a document addressed to Congress, the purpose of the United States to maintain the conflict on which we have entered as your allies, and to conquer, in his own language, submarines or no submarines, and we mean to do it. I believe that the people of the United States are ready with your people to shed the last drop of their blood, if it be necessary; to spend their last dollar, if it be necessary; to spend their last man, in order to achieve victory which is necessary to secure a lasting and permanent peace to all the people of the world.

On May 11 he remarked in an address:

For one I am most grateful that our country has entered this great fight for the freedom of the world. Now that our great President at Washington—and we all support him—has pledged to these allies all our resources, which means all of our men, all of our money, all of our munitions, and all of our hearts to stand by them, and, if need be, to die in the last ditch with them, victory, I believe, is assured.

At the reception to the Hon. Arthur J. Balfour on the following day he expressed the following sentiment:

Under the guidance of the President of our choice at Washington we stand pledged now before all the world to all the allies whom we have joined to carry into this conquest all that we have, all that we hope for, and all that we ever aspire unto. To-day every young man in America, and every old man, too, is asking, What can I do best to serve my country?

Perhaps his most important utterance during the days he was acting as chairman of the New York reception committee was on May 12 at the Waldorf-Astoria, when he made an address at the banquet given the members of both the French and English commissions and which was attended by 1,000 leading Americans, including William H. Taft and Theodore Roosevelt. Let me quote you the following:

Why has America entered this war? What has she to gain by it? Far removed from the scenes of carnage, her youth untouched, her manhood and her womanhood undisturbed, a few of her vessels sunk, a few lives lost—ample cause for war, but we waited; we were not ready. We are not very ready now, but by and by America will learn; America, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Lakes to the Gulf, America has learned what this war is about, what it is for—that it is for the establishment of freedom of free government against tyranny and oppression and autocracy and all the other horrible names that you can apply to misgovernment. When it came to that there was but one question for America, and our President at Washington has solved it for us. Nobody can tell how far he saw ahead any more than we at this moment can tell how far we can see ahead.

How these war-worn allies have suffered. How they have toiled. What horrible sacrifices they have submitted to. Their own homes have been decimated, their firesides made unhappy, their youths slaughtered, and they themselves are suffering extreme agony, as I believe. They, with their other noble allies, while we have gone on indulging in luxuries, increasing our wealth, thinking that no harm could ever come to us, that no guns could ever be forged big enough to reach our homes. And we began to hang our heads in shame until the President gave the final order that we must go and help them with all the might we can. For the first time, after two years and a half, I was able to hold up my head as high as the weight of 85 years would allow.

We are all familiar now with his last words to Mr. Balfour on their parting, after attending church together—

Remember, we shall meet again to celebrate the victory.

CAR SERVICE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Speaker to lay before the House the bill (H. R. 328), which is on the Speaker's table with a Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 328) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended in respect of car service, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That an act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, be further amended and supplemented as follows:

"The term 'car service' as used in this act shall include the movement, distribution, exchange, interchange, and return of cars used in the transportation of property by any carrier subject to the provisions of this act.

"It shall be the duty of every such carrier to establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable rules, regulations, and practices with respect to car service, and every unjust and unreasonable rule, regulation, and practice with respect to car service is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

"The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized by general or special orders to require all carriers subject to the provisions of the act, or any of them, to file with it from time to time their rules and regulations with respect to car service, and the commission may, in its discretion, direct that the said rules and regulations shall be incorporated in their schedules showing rates, fares, and charges for transportation and be subject to any or all of the provisions of the act relating thereto.

"The commission shall, after hearing, on a complaint or upon its own initiative, without complaint, establish reasonable rules, regulations, and practices with respect to car service, including the classification of cars, compensation to be paid for the use of any car not owned by any such common carrier and the penalties or other sanctions for nonobservance of such rules.

"Whenever the commission shall be of opinion that necessity exists for immediate action with respect to the supply or use of cars for transportation of property, the commission shall have, and it is hereby given, authority, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, at once, if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier or carriers, and with or without notice, hearing, or the making or filing of a report, according as the commission may determine, to suspend the operation of any or all rules, regulations, or practices then established with respect to car service for such time as may be determined by the commission, and also authority to make such just and reasonable directions with respect to car service during such time as, in its opinion, will best promote car service in the interest of the public and the commerce of the people.

"The directions of the commission as to car service may be made through and by such agents or agencies as the commission shall designate and appoint for that purpose.

"In case of failure or refusal on the part of any carrier, receiver, or trustee to comply with any direction or order with respect to car service, such carrier, receiver, or trustee shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $500 for each such offense and $50 for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. A part of the Senate amendment, referring to the act to regulate commerce, reads:

Be further amended and supplemented as follows.

What part of the act does it mean?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will state to the House that the only difficulty we encountered when considering this amendment was the fact that it did not connect with any section or part of the law and did not articulate with any sections of the bill as the original House bill did, but we concluded that it simply might be printed at the end of the commerce law, and although not numbered and classified, its terms could be readily understood, and as some action was urgently required, we accepted it, although we did not like the form of it.

Mr. MANN. I do not see why anybody would have authority to print this officially in connection with the act to regulate commerce, although it says it is an amendment, and not only says it is an amendment, but refers to the act to regulate commerce by the term "this act." The term "this act" in this Senate amendment does not mean the bill (H. R. 328), but it means the act to regulate commerce. It strikes me as being very awkward.

Mr. ADAMSON. I presume it will be printed as some other acts are printed, along with the interstate-commerce law, and referred to as the car-shortage act. On conference with some members of the Interstate Commerce Commission yesterday we decided that it could be easily understood that way, although not articulated with any of the sections of the act, and that it would take its place as a separate act in the collection of acts referring to the general subject of transportation, and we thought it better to concur in it as it is than to delay the legislation, because, as the gentleman is aware, there are very frequent revisions of the commerce law, and when the present hurly-burly is over there will be other revisions, so that this can be readily articulated in its proper place.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman recalls that ever since he and myself have been Members of the House, for 20 years, they have been talking about a codification of the laws on this subject, but it has never been done.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman knows that he very ably participated in two of these revisions.

Mr. MANN. We amended the law, but never codified it; and it is not likely to be codified very soon.

Mr. ADAMSON. We gave the law a very general overhauling.

Mr. MANN. This is a criminal statute. It may be that the court will guess that Congress intended to do something which it does not do, but if not they never will convict anybody under this statute.

Mr. ADAMSON. If they can not guess right, we will have to tell them. I will say to the gentleman that I rather favored the House version.

Mr. MANN. It would be so easy to say that section 1 of the act to regulate commerce is amended by adding thereto the following, which would not change the substance of this amendment in the slightest degree, and which would make it perfectly clear.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think so myself.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it would take the Senate five minutes to agree to that amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think myself that would be better, if the gentleman does not think it will be attended with delay.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any occasion for delay about it.

Mr. ADAMSON. If all of it properly relates to section 1, which it probably does.

Mr. MANN. It does not make any difference whether it does or not if we put it after section 1.

Mr. ADAMSON. It would if we said so.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. I suggest that that amendment be offered, because, as the gentleman well knows, we believe that the form of the bill as it passed the House was the proper form.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. ESCH. And that this bill as it now stands is practically an independent measure.

Mr. ADAMSON. It ought to have some relation to the act to regulate commerce.

Mr. ESCH. An amendment declaring it a part of section 1 of the interstate-commerce act would make it a part of that act, even though its provisions did not all relate to section 1.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I ask unanimous consent to modify my motion so that we concur with an amendment.

Mr. MANN. It is a matter of privilege. It does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move to concur with an amendment making this a part of section 1; that is, amending section 1 by adding the following.

Mr. MANN. The language would be—

That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, be further amended by adding to said section 1 the following.

Those words should take the place of the first paragraph of the Senate amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move to strike out the first paragraph of the Senate amendment and to insert in lieu thereof the words suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and with that amendment to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. That section 1 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, be further amended by adding at the end thereof the following.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment with that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first paragraph of the Senate amendment and insert: "That section 1 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is further amended by adding the following."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Senate amendment as amended was agreed to.

SESSION CLERKS FOR CERTAIN COMMITTEES.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 45.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Interior, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Labor, the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, each be allowed a clerk at the rate of $125 per month; that the Committee on Rules be allowed an assistant clerk at the rate of $100 per month; and that the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers be allowed a messenger at the rate of $60 per month during the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, the salaries of said clerks, assistant clerk, and messenger to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The following committee amendments were read:

Before the word "be," in line 13, page 1, insert the word "each."

Strike out all after the word "month," in line 13, on page 1, down to and including the word "month," in line 1, page 2.

In line 2, page 2, after the word "Congress," insert the words "beginning April 2, 1917."

In line 3, page 2, strike out the words "assistant clerk, and messenger."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PARK. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to offer the following additional committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, after the word "Congress," in line 5, page 2, down to the word "the," in line 6, and add in lieu thereof the following: "The pay of such clerks shall commence from the time they entered on the discharge of their duties, but in no case prior to April 2, 1917, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by certificates of the chairman of said committee."

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Is the Committee on Education included in that resolution?

Mr. PARK. Not in this, but it will be in the next one.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the language reported as it will read after being amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the language as it will read after being amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress the pay of such clerks to commence from the time they entered on the discharge of their duties, but in no case prior to April 2, 1917, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by a certificate of the chairman of said committee. The salaries of said clerks shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the theory that the committee proceeded upon in authorizing the clerks of these expenditure committees that never meet even during the regular session of Congress, when we are taking up general legislation, and at this session of Congress, when it is generally agreed that no committee will take any action except as to that which refers to war measures?

Mr. PARK. The chairmen of these expenditure committees are legally presumed to investigate the department whose expenditures they have in charge. Their duties are to ascertain what laws Congress passes that apply to the expenditure and ascertain whether or not the department that expends the money is properly expending it. Their duty also is to ascertain whether or not the departments have too many clerks employed or too few, and to supply the deficiency or eliminate the excess.

Now, whether or not the chairmen of these committees do their duty as the law expects them to do I can not say, for I do not know. The gentleman can find out by asking the chairmen.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee has made no investigation as to whether these committees perform the functions that are delegated to them under the rule?

Mr. PARK. Yes; some of them have already made investigations.

Mr. STAFFORD. At this session?

Mr. PARK. Yes; so they tell me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. PARK. No; there is one exception to it, I think.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the resolution by inserting in line 13, page 1, after the word "month," the following: "that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries be allowed an assistant clerk at the rate of $125 a month."

Mr. MANN. If that amendment goes in anywhere, it ought to go in on the other resolution. This only relates to expenditure committees, and there is a resolution relating to other committees to be offered.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a brief explanation. The last amendment offered was for the purpose of preventing any chairman having a clerk who does not perform the duties required by law of him as chairman. That is, his duty being to investigate the department whose expenditures are referred to him. If he qualifies under that amendment and states that in his place as chairman of the committee he has already entered upon the discharge of his duties and employed the necessary help, then the pay of that clerk is authorized on the certified statement by this chairman. If he has not employed anybody, if he has not designated a clerk and begun an investigation of the department over which he has supervision, he is not provided with a clerk until he does begin the investigation. I now yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the committee that reports this resolution is generally known as the housekeeping committee of this House. The matter they present may not be in these stirring times a matter of great importance, but as a precedent in war times I consider it of vital importance. The chairman of the committee has just said that if these clerks are needed the chairmen of these different committees can now stand up in the House and say so and have you pass upon it. I object to that procedure. That is the procedure that I wanted the committee to follow when this resolution was introduced earlier in the session. When this resolution was introduced the minority of the committee—and there are only four of us, and we are all opposed to the resolution—considering that this is an extra session of Congress to pass war measures, took the position that the Committee on Accounts should call before the committee the chairmen of these several committees and find out the facts. I want to say to you that the chairmen of these committees never came. Whether an opportunity was given to them I do not know, but on the day when the resolution was reported one chairman was heard, and only one. By an investigation since I am not satisfied with the facts that he told us then with reference to the need for a clerk for his committee. You will see, if you look over the resolution, that it is possible that some of these committees need a clerk. Possibly they do, but do not understand that I say they do. I do not know whether they do or not, and the committee does not pretend to know; but they want you here on the floor of the House to find out for yourselves by this original investigation conducted by the House in its own time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman inform the House how long it has been since some of these committees have had a meeting? Did they do anything at all in the last Congress?

Mr. SANFORD. I have no reliable information upon the subject, but I understand that the majority of these committees never meet, never perform any function whatever, and probably will not for a long time to come. They certainly will not perform any essential function at this extra session of Congress. In other words, we could fight this war without these particular committees.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. If these clerks are appointed to these committees that do not meet, what will the clerks do?

Mr. MANN. They will draw their salaries.

Mr. SANFORD. They certainly will draw their salaries, as has been suggested, and I do not believe that there is anything else for them to do. One is likely to be misled by the titles of these different committees, but every one in the House knows that the functions one would think would be performed by the committees carrying these titles are now performed by other more important committees of the House. We know that with reference to naval matters, with reference to military matters, and with reference to all of the other matters mentioned here the important functions are performed by the major committees having these matters in charge.

This is not in any sense a partisan matter. It is just a matter of plain economy. If you think that expenditure of money has some relation to the raising of revenue, then you will think that this resolution is important. I have a notion that at a time like this, when this House yesterday, as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means said, passed the biggest tax measure that was ever imposed on any people, the House should find itself in a frame of mind to-day where it would be difficult to get it to approve even $1,375 a month of absolutely useless expenditure of public money.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I understood the gentleman to say that this is in no sense a partisan matter. Democrats will be appointed to all of these places, will they not?

Mr. SANFORD. Oh, I have gotten the habit of saying that this is not a partisan matter. I learned that from the Committee on Ways and Means. It is nonpartisan.

Mr. LANGLEY. I know the economy part is not, of course.

Mr. SANFORD. But I am glad to say that the four Republican members on the committee stand solidly opposed to the useless expenditure of money.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Have any bills or resolutions been referred to any of these committees during the present session?

Mr. SANFORD. I understand it is the habit at this special session for these committees to have some bills introduced and referred to them, but the gentleman knows and I know that those bills will not receive the attention of Congress at this extra session.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SANFORD. Yes.
Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. It occurs to me that this above all times must be the time for those committees to exercise their jurisdiction, when the departments of the Government are going to expend extraordinary amounts of money.
Mr. SANFORD. I will answer the gentleman in this way: Let me tell him what facts I have been able to find out on my own account. First, I will say that the majority of these committees have not done anything so far as I can find out from members of these committees for a number of years, and I have talked with the men and I find that there is no real intention to do anything at this time. And I want to say that if they attempted to do anything now they would only obstruct and impede these important departments of the Government who really have the responsibility. It would be absolutely impossible for the personnel of these committees now to organize and tell the Navy Department anything, for instance, or to give the House any information within the few weeks that remain of this extra session of Congress; but let me say this to the gentleman—and this is a fact I dislike to state because some people may misunderstand me—there are 11 committees provided for in this resolution, and of those 11 committees at the last session of Congress the name of the clerk of the committee was the same as the name of the secretary of the chairman of the committee, presumably allowed $1,500 a year for his work as secretary. I do not say that there is anything wrong in a Member of Congress drawing for John Doe $1,500 a year for services rendered as secretary, and at the same time coming in here and voting $125 a month for the same man as clerk of the committee of which he happens to be chairman; but I am willing to say that on the face of it it presents a state of facts that can not have my approval.
Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SANFORD. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman.
Mr. LENROOT. Aside from what the gentleman now states, does not the practice conclusively show that these clerks are not necessary?
Mr. SANFORD. That is the reason I mention it here, because it seems to me to be most evident that if one person can hold both jobs, possibly one of the jobs is not necessary to be filled.
Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SANFORD. I will be glad to do so.
Mr. DILLON. Does the gentleman mean to say that the clerk of the House Member acts as secretary and also draws an additional salary for this clerkship?
Mr. SANFORD. To make it clear to the gentleman, I will say that under the legislative appropriation bill that we passed at the last session it is required that the names of the clerks of the Members appear on the roll of the House. You remember that at the last session the Members of this House made a stiff fight against getting our personal clerks on the pay roll to be paid by the Government. After a stiff fight with the Senate for the privilege to pay our clerks we got that privilege. Under this bill, the same person, I will say to the gentleman now, who receives the salary as clerk of the committee appears in nine instances out of eleven as the congressional secretary of the Member of Congress who happens to be the chairman of the committee.
Mr. ELSTON and Mr. LANGLEY rose.
The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from New York yield?
Mr. SANFORD. I will yield in just a minute.
I want to say in connection with that that I can see that it would be unwise for me to draw any conclusions from these facts. The point is that the public may draw a bad conclusion. I do not know what conclusion to draw, but I draw at first view a conclusion that is not in any way creditable to this House or the membership of it who engage in this practice. But I am sufficiently experienced in public matters to say that there may be some explanation. If there is an explanation it should have been given to the Committee on Accounts before this resolution was reported on this floor.
Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. SANFORD. I will be very glad to yield.
Mr. HOWARD. I believe the gentleman said that these committees are mere sinecures, and that they never meet.
Mr. SANFORD. I will say to the gentleman I do not know what they do, and I therefore stood in the committee for a resolution that would permit the chairmen of the committees to come in privately before our committee and tell what they did and the need there was for the clerk. So if this House acts now, it will either act on the unreliable information which it gathers here in the heat of debate or act in ignorance.
Mr. HOWARD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these committees on expenditures in the various accounting departments can never call in any of the accounting officers and ask them about the permanent expenditures in those departments?
Mr. SANFORD. Some of the members of the committees have told me the committees have never met. I say that our committee should have found out the facts for themselves before they brought in this resolution.
Mr. ELSTON. Do I understand that the chairmen of the committees included in this resolution have clerks, and that the purpose of this is to give them an extra clerk?
Mr. SANFORD. This is to provide for the committees who have no extra clerks and, so far as I know, have no duties to perform at this session of Congress.
Mr. ELSTON. Then, the designation by the chairman of his clerk as secretary of the committee is entirely an ex officio designation and details an extra clerk with no pay?
Mr. SANFORD. As I understand, it does not detail an extra clerk, but it does provide extra pay providing the person gets the pay that is allowed to the Member of Congress whose secretary he appears to be.
Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SANFORD. I will.
Mr. LANGLEY. I think it is well, in this connection, to remember that on the 1st of July these clerks to the Members will receive additional compensation.
Mr. SANFORD. Yes. After the 1st of July the clerks of the Members of Congress will receive $2,000 per year, and if such a clerk gets this $125 a month he gets that in addition. I do not care how much he gets if he earns it and if it is necessary to spend the money. I can not comprehend how, under the provision of the law, the clerks to the Members of Congress can have any idle time, because the law provides that each Member of Congress shall have $2,000 a year for clerical help, but only so much thereof as he must necessarily use for clerical help in the discharge of his official duties. If a Member of Congress does not spend the $2,000 appropriated for clerical help he has no legal right to take it, and if he pays that to the man whom he has designated as secretary, how he can possibly, under these circumstances, put the name of the same man down as a clerk to a committee, I do not understand.
Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SANFORD. I will be glad to yield.
Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman's remark about the committees not meeting applies only to this session of Congress, does it not?
Mr. SANFORD. The information I have is that most of these committees never meet. I have met several men on the committees who have told me personally that they never had a meeting.
Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman's information is not correct.
Mr. SANFORD. My information is reliable. It may not apply to all the committees but to some of them.
Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. For instance, in the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and in some of the committees on expenditures in some of the other departments, it is true. Now, the committee can not be expected to do any work until it gets a clerk. If you do not provide for it they can not do the work.
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?
Mr. SANFORD. Yes; I will be very glad to.
Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] just suggested that a committee can not be expected to do its work unless it is allowed a clerk. But if the secretary to a member who is chairman of a committee is named as the clerk, then the committee chairman would not get any additional help.
Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not know anything about it.
Mr. SANFORD. That is true in 9 cases out of 11 in reference to these committees to investigate the expenditures in the different departments.
Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SANFORD. Yes.
Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman to make the statement that the chairmen of these investigating committees name their private clerks or secretaries as the clerks to the committees also?
Mr. SANFORD. In 9 cases out of 11 under this resolution; that is, they did it at the last session of Congress.

Now, the proposition incorporated in this bill by the committee amendment is that these men shall receive pay from the 2d day of April.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman does not mean that that is the practice at this session of Congress, but that it has been the practice heretofore?

Mr. SANFORD. That was the practice when they had the right to have a clerk.

Now, one gentleman appeared before our committee and asked to be allowed a clerk on the ground that it was absolutely necessary, and he proposed as the clerk the name of the person who is his secretary now.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not know that the chairman of a committee would have the right to make this appointment under the law, but if the secretary of a Member who is chairman of one of those committees had imposed upon him the additional duty of being clerk to the committee, why should he not be entitled to additional compensation?

Mr. SANFORD. Well, he is going to get $2,000 compensation a year, beginning on the 1st of July. Does the gentleman want to give to that same man an additional salary of $125 a month?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; I do not say that. But if a man is receiving compensation for the performance of a certain character of duties and then additional duties are imposed on him, he has the right to have additional compensation.

Mr. SANFORD. A proposition was submitted before our committee not long ago to pay Tom, Dick, and Harry, now on the pay roll of the House in various positions, for extra work done during the session.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Is there not a provision of law providing that employees of the Government shall not draw two salaries at the same time?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes; but that would not apply here, because the secretary of a Member of Congress is not an official employee of the Government or on the pay rolls in his capacity as clerk to a Member of Congress, but presumably he gets his pay.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question there?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the various chairmen of the committees wanting clerks appear before the committee to show why clerks should be allowed?

Mr. SANFORD. No. The minority proposed a resolution inviting them to come, but only one came.

Mr. MADDEN. How could the Committee on Accounts have any information to show that these clerks are needed if nobody appeared before them?

Mr. SANFORD. The committee has no information on the subject.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Committee on Accounts, of which he is a distinguished member, recommends to this House the expenditure of a lot of money for the employment of additional clerks without having any information on which to base their recommendation?

Mr. SANFORD. I have absolutely no information. As I say, we favored the passage of a resolution inviting the chairmen of these respective committees to come before us and testify, and on the occasion when I advocated the adoption of that resolution I was accused of obstructing the public business, and somewhat in disorder the committee adjourned. [Laughter.] I say this in all good nature. There is but one justification for this resolution, and that is——

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman think that quite a number of these "unnecessary" committees are really necessary in order that all the Members may receive committee appointments? [Laughter.]

Mr. SANFORD. Yes. There is but one justification for this resolution, and that is precedent. If you want to follow precedents blindly during this war and authorize all kinds of extravagances because you can point back and say that somebody else did it, then pass this resolution blindly.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Let me finish this first. But if you are going to follow precedent, why continue to have this Committee on Accounts? You do not need a Committee on Accounts, with 11 members taking their time going down there trying to have meetings if you are going to do these things year after year simply because they did them 20 or 40 years ago. For instance, take our Committee on Accounts. We have a clerk at $2,500 a year. We have an assistant clerk at $1,800 a year, and the pay roll shows that we have a janitor at $1,000 a year. Why spend $5,300 a year to come up here and simply follow precedent? Are we afraid of the facts? If your committee is willing to act in the light of day, why on earth are you not willing to find out the facts and report the facts, instead of coming in here without any facts?

Mr. MADDEN. In this time of stress, when everybody is advised by the President of the United States to economize in their food supply and to economize in their clothing and in all other expenses, does not the gentleman think it would be wise for the House of Representatives, that has to pass the laws, to begin to economize here somewhere on expenses that are not necessary?

Mr. SANFORD. In answering that I will say that, roughly speaking, after we have taxed a man with an income of $2,000 $20 a year, as we did in the bill yesterday, it would take over 60 of those taxpayers simply to pay for these extra committee clerks that are proposed. Do you wish to put that burden on them and spend the money in that way?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say to the gentleman that I am chairman of one of these committees, and I want to do one of two things: Either abolish the committees or organize them. The gentleman admits that a committee can not do anything until it is organized.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman tell me what committee it is?

Mr. HARDY. I am chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and have been for quite a while.

Mr. SANFORD. I can only say to the gentleman that I do not care to reflect on that committee or on that situation. I simply take the position that the Committee on Accounts in these war times ought to know what the facts are, and act according to the needs as revealed by the facts.

Mr. HARDY. I want to get this thing straight. Either these committees ought to exist or they ought not to exist. You admit that they can not exist efficiently or effectively until they have clerks. Can they?

Mr. SANFORD. I will state that if the only reason for the existence of a committee is to have a clerk, then it ought not to exist. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman believe that they ought to be abolished? I want to state this, that when I was first appointed chairman of that committee the administration was Republican. We spent a great deal of time in investigating the expenditures of the Navy. I want to extend, if I stay on that committee, the opportunity to the Republican members to delve into and probe into the expenditures of the Democratic administration. Either these committees on expenditures ought to exist or they ought not to exist. If we are not to have clerks, I want to resign my chairmanship.

Mr. SANFORD. I understand the gentleman's position; and, as I understand it, these expenditure committees have heretofore been the instrument used by the incoming administration for investigating and criticizing the retiring administration. But you are still in, and there is no reason for your conducting an investigation on that theory.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman pardon me? I want to say that the Republican members of that committee were as industrious and intelligent and willing to help investigate the expenditures as were the Democratic members.

Mr. SANFORD. I think I have yielded enough. I want to say in answer to the gentleman that it is my personal view, with the facts I have, that it would be unfortunate for your committee now to attempt to investigate the Navy Department; first, because you have not at your disposal, even with one clerk, sufficient means to make an intelligent and thorough investigation. You certainly have not the control or the knowledge of these matters that the House reposes in the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HARDY. Then, the committee ought to be abolished.

Mr. SANFORD. We might organize such a committee as that, and have it make an investigation.

Mr. HARDY. Ought not the committee to be abolished?

Mr. SANFORD. I think it ought to rest dormant. I do not think it would be any harm to continue to confer on the gentleman the high honor of being chairman of a committee with such a high-sounding name.

Mr. HARDY. I do not want it, if that is all there is to it.

Mr. MADDEN. I served on one of these committees to investigate expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, the chairman of which committee drew the salary of the secretary, and also the salary of the clerk, and he did not have either a secretary or a clerk. We exposed that on the floor of the House.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Did the gentleman say he was chairman of that committee? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I did not. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] knows who the chairman was.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman stated that he could hear from only one member of the committee that morning.

Mr. SANFORD. In the committee.

Mr. LOBECK. We were called together at 10.30. Myself and other members were present, ready to be heard.

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. You adjourned at 11 o'clock, and gave no opportunity, except to two men, to be heard.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not know why the committee did not hear the particular gentleman who was there ready to tell his facts, but the committee would not hear him, and adjourned and came up here.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman left the impression that there was only one man present.

Mr. SANFORD. I did not mean to leave that impression, that there was only one present.

Mr. LOBECK. It would not be fair to the others who were present to leave that impression.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK] was there willing and anxious to give some facts, but the committee did not want any facts. Now, why? It would not be right to take facts in one case and ignore them in others. This House would not feel justified, for instance, in authorizing 11 committee clerks because 2 committees needed clerks. There may be some of these committees that need clerks. I do not know. I simply take the position that no committee ought to have a clerk, not even one committee, unless it needs it.

Mr. LUNN. I was very much interested in this report as given by the gentleman from New York and am largely in sympathy with his position. It seems to me if any of these committees do not meet they are not needed, and therefore the expenditure for the salary of a clerk can not be justified. There must be need for a committee to examine expenditures, but it seems to me we could make provision to combine all of these committees in one effective committee that will work, or else we ought to abolish them all.

Mr. SANFORD. I would like to say to the gentleman that it occurs to me to be within the possibility that before we go far into this matter of raising big revenue to run the war there may be great need of reorganization of this House, in order that we may give to the country an example of our willingness to sacrifice when we are calling upon others to live on a scale of living that they have never dreamed of before. For instance, take our legislative appropriation bill. Perhaps some of you will be surprised to know that during this year we have on the pay roll of this House men drawing salaries for clerical services and as janitors and messengers amounting to $1,529,290—over a million and a half dollars for clerical and janitor help just for this House alone. I am for the expenditure of every dollar of that money that is necessary. I am for reforming that system, if it can be reformed, in order that half or three-quarters of it can be saved during the war. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. I stand with you on this proposition.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, how much time have we on this matter if we want it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 25 minutes left.

Mr. PARK. Of the hour?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. PARK. I just want to make a few remarks. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, no man in this House is the keeper of another's conscience or can control his conduct. Every Member is responsible to the district that he represents, and not to the House. The House has jurisdiction and the right to expel a Member or criticize him for misconduct and for breaking the rules of the House. Now, gentlemen, some of the chairmen of committees whose names I read to you are present. I call on these gentlemen. I know nothing about what they have done. If we had taken up the gentleman's offer we would have been here until next December examining these various chairmen of committees.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture is Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice is Hon. JOHN E. RAKER.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Interior is Hon. WILLIAM W. HASTINGS.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce is Hon. ROBERT CROSSER.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Labor is Hon. CHRISTOPHER D. SULLIVAN.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department is Hon. RUFUS HARDY.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department is Hon. EDWARD KEATING.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department is Hon. COURTNEY W. HAMLIN.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PARK. I believe the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] stated that he did not desire a clerk.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like about five minutes of the hour.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman think that that committee ought to have a clerk when it does not want it?

Mr. PARK. The gentleman from Missouri told me that, but I had forgotten it.

Mr. SANFORD. It would not have taken five minutes for the committee to have got that information.

Mr. PARK. The House met at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SANFORD. I know it; but I was there two minutes before, because I expected something to happen. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARK. Now, these 11 committees, eliminating the committee of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], if provided with session clerks, are to be paid $125 a month, the same salary as they received in previous sessions. That means an expenditure of $1,375 a month, of $4,125, if the session continues through the month of June to the 1st of July.

The amendment offered by the committee and accepted by the House was this: If the chairman of each of these committees had, under oath, stated that he had begun an investigation of the department expenditures referred to his committee, then he would get a clerk. That settles that unless the Members think the chairmen might commit perjury to get a clerk.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the result as proposed by the gentleman's committee still permit the chairman to appoint his private secretary as a clerk of that committee?

Mr. PARK. I do not know whether the House can control that or not. I have tried to find out what the law was about it.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Does not the gentleman think it would be a wise provision to introduce an amendment forbidding the chairmen of various committees appointing their private secretaries as clerks?

Mr. PARK. I think it is already provided for.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Does not the gentleman think we ought to make it more explicit?

Mr. REAVIS. If the gentleman will yield, would it not be better, if the private secretary can do the work, to do away with the clerk?

Mr. PARK. That may be all right.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. In fairness to the chairman of the committee, the private secretary who works 15 or 16 hours a day—and plenty of them do, and I am not chairman of one of these committees—but if the secretary working double time keeps up the work on his part as secretary and does this other work he should not do it for the salary of a secretary alone, should he?

Mr. PARK. I am not going to yield to anybody else until I get through with this statement. I agree with the gentleman from New York that precedents are not always to control, but that right should control if we know what is right. Now, we have precedents. A resolution providing for session clerks for expenditure committees was passed by the House during the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, an extra session.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARK. I said I would not, but I will.

Mr. MANN. Did these committees have a clerk before that time?

Mr. PARK. Yes. Some had clerks 101 years ago.

Mr. MANN. They did not, because they were not then in existence.

Mr. PARK. I will explain to the gentleman. Six of them, as shown by the committee report accompanying the resolution, were created March 30, 1816; one March 16, 1860; one January 16, 1874; one December 20, 1889; and one December 11, 1905.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to ask when these committees were created, if the gentleman has the information, and how long the precedent existed to which he has referred as to authorizing expenditure committees to have clerks?

Mr. PARK. I have just stated when they were created.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that our committee had a clerk looking up the matter, and we found that the expenditure committees have always had clerks at all prior sessions of Congress since the committees were created. It has always been the practice to have clerks of these committees during the regular and special sessions of Congress.

Mr. PARK. Yes. Now, let me proceed. These committees referred to in this resolution were also provided with session clerks in the first session of the Sixty-first Congress, when they were paid $6 a day or $180 a month instead of the $125 that we provide here. I might add by way of parenthesis that I could have dug into this matter on the opposite side of the House and found something, but I did not. I did not desire to do it. These expenditure committees were provided with session clerks in the second session of the Sixty-second Congress. They were provided with session clerks in the first session of the Sixtieth Congress; and at this time, when all the departments are expending millions of money where they expended thousands before, where graft has the best opportunity it ever has had, where chairmen of these committees should ascertain what the law is and apply it to the methods of expenditure of these departments, it seems to me that it is the part of wisdom, if not absolutely necessary. These committees should do their work and do whatever is necessary so that the Government and the people of the United States can get what is coming to them under the law provided years ago.

Now, there is no fault with the law, gentlemen. The services performed will provide ample saving to the Government, and if not performed it is the neglect of the chairman of the committee and not of the law. It seems that we ought not to place on the law the misconduct of the chairman of a committee. If the chairman will do his duty under the law there will be millions saved to this Government, perhaps.

I have a letter from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and he wants an assistant clerk and gives good reasons for it.

Now, the Committee on the Census, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the Committee on Claims, the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Committee on Flood Control, the Committee on Immigration, the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the Committee on Mines and Mining, the Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the Committee on Railways and Canals, the Committee on Rivers and Horbors, the Committee on Roads, the Committee on Territories, the Committee on War Claims, all these committees are dormant, and yet they have clerks and assistant clerks, but no criticism is made of them. Why not criticize all alike?

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield? I think the gentleman is not quite accurate in saying that the Committee on Invalid Pensions is dormant. He is mistaken about that.

Mr. PARK. Then I will withdraw the statement in regard to that committee. Now, gentlemen, I wish to add in concluding my few remarks that this is a matter for the House, and one the House should carefully go into and not take one side of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would like, for my own information, to ask the gentleman if he has any record showing how often these committees on expenditures meet?

Mr. PARK. No; but I have called the names of the chairmen of these committees, and they can get up here and state it if they desire.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman has called the roll and they can respond.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Gentlemen upon the other side seem to be criticizing this side. Is it not a fact that when the Sixty-third Congress met, when the Democrats obtained control of the House, they abolished between 10 and 13 dead committees?

Mr. PARK. Yes; at a saving of $180,000 a year; but that is all right. It is owing to whose ox is being gored. When the Democrats get in the Republicans jump upon them and criticize, and vice versa, and that is all right; that is politics.

Mr. LANGLEY. A 50-50 proposition.

Mr. HAMLIN and Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. To anyone who desires me to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would like to get a little time. I want 10 minutes.

Mr. PARK. Have I 10 minutes more, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. PARK. I can not give the gentleman 10 minutes. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have been the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department since the session which convened in 1911. We have done considerable work since that time, as some of the older Members here will recall. Some time ago a gentleman came to me and asked me if I would introduce a resolution providing for a clerk for our committee during this extraordinary session. I told him that I would not, and I told him why. Afterwards I was invited to come before the Committee on Accounts to urge a favorable report on this resolution. I declined to do that, and I told them why I would not do it.

This session, as I understand it, is to be devoted exclusively, or practically so, to the consideration of matters immediately affecting the prosecution of the present war, and I had no intention of calling my committee together during this extraordinary sesssion of Congress for the purpose of prosecuting its work. If I did not call it together, of course I did not think that I needed a clerk to my committee, and I am sorry that the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department is included in this resolution, because, as the chairman of the Committee on Accounts stated, I told him that I, as chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, did not want a clerk. Having stated that, I think it is only fair to state another thing. The intimations made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] against all of these expenditure committees are not justified. I know that some of them have done splendid work, and that they have saved this Government a great deal of money. During one session of Congress my committee was very active. We did make a pretty thorough examination of expenditures in the State Department. We developed some things that were not to the credit of some people. Among other things, we uncovered the fact that a certain New York bank, in the gentleman's State, acting as the fiscal agent for this Government, had collected and failed to turn over to the Government $116,000, which it owed the Government at that time. Our committee uncovered that fact; and we developed another fact, that out of a fund known as the emergency fund, or the secret fund, in the State Department—a fund that had been given to that department for use as a secret fund and for which they had not to account, except by a certificate of the Secretary of State certifying that he had expended so much money, but not mentioning the purpose for which it was expended. The appropriation averaged when the Republicans were in power $90,000 a year for this so-called secret fund. All sorts and kinds of expenditures were being made out of this fund. Notably, it will be recalled that there was paid out of this fund $2,500 for the painting of a picture of Associate Justice Day, an ex-Secretary of State. That was paid to a man named Rosenthal, an artist in Philadelphia. A report of that expenditure was made in lump by the State Department under section 291 of the Revised Statutes, known as the secret section, but no statement was made as to what this money was spent for. Twenty-five hundred dollars was the sum the Government paid somebody for the painting of that portrait. But, as a matter of fact, we developed that the artist received only $850 for the painting of this portrait, leaving the balance of the sixteen hundred and fifty dollars in the hands of the then chief clerk of the State Department unsatisfactorily accounted for. That money has never been accounted for, in fact, to this day. Growing out of that investigation——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. PARK. I can not yield the gentleman any more. I have only 10 minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the same privilege.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general time be extended 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the general time of debate be extended 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who is going to control the time?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I would like to know who is going to control that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know; and, if nobody else controls it, the Chair will. The Chair will put the request again. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended 20 minutes, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] to have 5 minutes, the gentleman from Massachusetts 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Texas 5 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I ask that five minutes be reserved for the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from New York for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. SEARS. In view of the statement showing the large expenditures that his committee had investigated, does not the gentleman think now, of all times, these committees should be more active than they have in the past?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am very glad that the gentleman asked that question, and I was going to reach that question very soon. I want to repeat that it is not fair to criticize these committees as they have been criticized here this morning—not purposely, I think, but unwittingly. They can be, and have been in some cases, of great benefit to this Government.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. For a question.

Mr. MANN. Admitting all the gentleman says, did any of these committees have a meeting in the last Congress so far as he knows, except to confirm a clerk?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think that is about all.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that there will be a meeting of any of the committees in this Congress except to confirm a clerk?

Mr. HAMLIN. I can not speak for any of the committees except my own. I am not going to call my committee at this extra session unless something should come up that would seem to justify such action.

In reply to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS], I will say that after this war is over, no matter which party is in power, these expenditure committees, if they will only get active, can accomplish great good, in my judgment. The Committee on Expenditures in the State Department is one of the early committees organized in this Government. It is over 100 years old. It hardly lies in the mouth of our Republican friends to criticize the fact that we did not meet, some of us, last session. The records of my committee show that there never was a single meeting of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department from, I think, the year 1887, until the Sixtieth Congress, in 1907. And yet the records will show that the House was under Republican rule most of that time and under Democratic rule during a portion of that time, and these committees were appointed during each regular session. Now, I say that it is hardly fair to criticize us because we have not been active at every session. It is not necessary, perhaps, to be active every session. I may say, and I will betray no secret in saying it in further answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that while we did not meet often to formally investigate as a committee last session, I made more trips than one down to the State Department and made inquiries as to certain expenditures. And not only did I do that, but I told one certain official down there that if there was any inclination to attempt to make certain expenditures in a certain way the committee would be called and an invesigation had.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Are not these committees—what you might call "sporadic" committees—at times very essential and at times with nothing to do?

Mr. HAMLIN. Surely. That is exactly why I did not want a clerk at this session, because I did not think the time was appropriate for an investigation at this session. I do not believe, and I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], that these committees ought not now to embarrass or interfere with these departments in their stress and strain, almost to the breaking point.

Mr. LOBECK. Is it not true that the only legislation that will be considered by the House is now in the committees of the House that are actively at work on war matters?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is true. And I want to say that it is hardly fair to these expenditure committees, when you get right down to it, gentlemen, to criticize them even by intimation. There are other committees in this House who have annual clerks, paying $2,000 to $2,500, with assistant clerks, and janitors, that are not active this session, or not doing anything—faithfully carrying out the wishes of the caucus. We all know that is true.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. They are just as active as if the House were not in special session?

Mr. HAMLIN. No. The committees which I had in mind are active at the regular sessions.

Mr. MANN. The question really is whether they ought to have annual clerks or these committees ought to have annual clerks. I do not undertake to say.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think these committees ought to have annual clerks, and not have this contest come up every time Congress meets.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. In response to the suggestion made a while ago, I do not know whether by the gentleman or some one who interrogated him, that at a time like this these committees ought to remain quiet, does the gentleman think that the committee on any one of these expenditures, where the members know of waste, caused either by reckless inefficiency or the result of it, or else the result of graft or fraud practiced on the departments, ought to be quiet any more than at any other time?

Mr. HAMLIN. Of course not.

Mr. WINGO. And will not the gentleman assist it acting along that line?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state, as far as my committee is concerned, I have made more than one trip down to the State Department, as I have said, to determine certain matters that I thought ought to be looked after.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I want to take a minute of the time. A while ago I made the statement that the Committee on Mines and Mining was a dormant committee. I am informed by the chairman it is not. I withdraw the statement.

I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. Have I the right to offer an amendment at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SABATH). I think the gentleman has the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. PARK. All right. I offer this amendment. I do not know exactly where to put it in, but here it is:

Provided, That no chairman of any of these committees herein named shall have a clerk until he expresses his intention that he proposes to investigate the expenditures in the department over which his committee has jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does that relate back to the payment of a clerk before they commence to do anything?

Mr. PARK. Sure. This amendment I offer does that. He will not draw a nickel until he gets it.

Mr. MANN. If the chairman said he was going to do business in the future, after Congress adjourned?

Mr. PARK. You mean the amendment I have just offered?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PARK. No. When he applies for the clerk he expresses his intention to go to work.

Mr. MANN. We have already agreed to an amendment providing that the pay shall commence when the chairman certifies that he has been appointed.

Mr. PARK. I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio, before he does that, permit me to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK] a question?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Georgia says these committees would not have these clerks unless they made investigations. Does the gentleman know that under the rules of the House they can not make an investigation except on information which they can get voluntarily?

Mr. PARK. Yes; but when a man sits here all during a session and does not try to do any work, he ought not to have a clerk.

Mr. WINGO. How can a man investigate without authority? I have been looking into the matter, and I find that the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department has no authority at all to get information, except such information as it can get voluntarily. It can not send for books and papers or subpœna witnesses. It can get only such information as is voluntarily offered it.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will come into the House and say to the House that his committee needs that power and authority, he will get it.

Mr. WINGO. They need it and ought to exercise it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BATHRICK offers the following: Add a new section, as follows:

"The said committees shall be required to sit continuously during the term of the war with Germany, and shall hold hearings to investigate expenditures in the departments under their jurisdictions. There is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of these committees the sum of $200,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BATHRICK. I hope the gentleman will reserve it and let me talk for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve it.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, when the Democrats came into power in this House in 1911 we found that the committees on expenditures in the departments had been dead ones for 16 years. Some of us new Members then were given positions on these committees. We were anxious to do something, and we went ahead; nearly every one of the committees went to work, and nearly every one of them found much material that deserved investigation, and as a result we uncovered some wrongs that should have been uncovered long before.

Now, having been in power for over four years, I hope that it will not be said that the Democratic Party has permitted these committees on expenditures to relapse into a condition of "innocuous desuetude," to use the term of a distinguished President, now dead. But that is practically the situation to-day. The committees on expenditures have done nothing, and are doing nothing.

The purpose of my amendment is to call the attention of the House of Representatives to the fact that in these times of enormous expenditures these committees should be given a power that would enable them to do great good to the country. Now is the time of all times for them to work, and I want to say to the Republican Members of this House that you do your part; you can demand that the chairmen of these committees shall call their members together, and if you have anything on which to base a belief that certain things should be investigated you can insist upon it in committee and on the floor of the House. If we have all these committees in actual operation, actually working, we can save to this Government many millions of dollars. Such committees should have power enough to enable them to send subcommittees to various places throughout the United States, even out to the Pacific coast, if necessary, and thereby make a more careful examination of Government expenditures. They are the only body, the only organization that we have now by which these expenditures can be investigated. Why not give them power and money and pepper? I want to make these committees live ones, and I want to have money enough provided to make the investigations live ones.

If such an amendment as I offer is not adopted, there is no use in giving clerks to these committees. I do not want to say that they are dead ones, but by the RECORD it appears that they are not very much alive. I do not want to say they are not alive at all, because they are a part of the Democratic administration. Yet if they will do nothing they are no credit to us. For whatever reason they have not been active there is no such reason now, and they should go forward and do something. The chairmen of these committees can make a reputation for themselves if they are really and truly live ones. Already there are rumors about this mistake or that mistake; about one graft or another. Why not summon officials and others from the various departments and ascertain whether there are mistakes or not, and find out whether or not money is being wasted? I think no officials are involved, but a board of grafters hang like buzzards about our overflowing Treasury.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I agree largerly with what the gentleman is saying, but I do not believe we ought to brand the chairmen of those committees as being of no account.

Mr. BATHRICK. I do not so brand them. I only ask that their committees shall perform the service for which they were selected. If they will not do this, they should not ask for clerks merely to increase their patronage.

Mr. FERRIS. This Congress has only been in session for a month, and we were specifically directed not to do anything.

Mr. BATHRICK. Who directed them not to do anything?

Mr. FERRIS. We had a caucus, as the gentleman knows, and we agreed not to enter upon a program of general legislation.

Mr. BATHRICK. There was a program of legislation but no inhibition on investigation. Those committees can be made the most useful committees in this House if they will enter upon that work. I am in favor of furnishng them with money to travel and to go where it is necessary to investigate, and I am confident enormous sums of money would be saved to the people.

I ask that the amendment be passed. If it is not passed, the resolution to give them more clerks should not be passed.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out "the State Department," because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] says they do not want a clerk. I move to strike out "the State Department."

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order, Mr. Speaker, on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. PARK. How about my amendment?

The SPEAKER. That can be voted on after debate. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized for five minutes. The point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] is sustained on the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate that has taken place in regard to the employment of clerks to the various committees on expenditures in the departments. I have been a Member of the House for 19 years, and I served on one of those minor committees shortly after I became a member—as one of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department. Never during all the time I was a member of that committee was any meeting ever held. In due time I rose by regular gradation to the chairmanship of the committee, and I was named as chairman. The only advantage of being chairman of a committee of that kind, as I found during my service and since, was, that a chairman was awarded a room that he could use for his work. At that time an office room was a great convenience. I was very much interested in the statement made by the gentleman from Oklahoma, that during the Republican rule here clerks to those committees were provided and salaries were paid. Possibly there were to some of the committees, but I never heard of any clerks being provided or any salaries paid. I never heard of any salaries being proposed for these clerks until some years ago, when there was talk of paying for session clerks. Previous to the time of investigations, inaugurated after the Republicans went out of power, there rarely was a time when the committees on expenditures in the departments had displayed any activity in opening up the question of investigation of expenditures in the different departments.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. Does not the gentleman believe it would be the better policy for the party in power to investigate rather than to wait until it goes out of power and then let the other party investigate?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I certainly think so. I do not object to proper investigations.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I wish to say that as soon as the Democrats elected a majority in the House I was made chairman of one of these committees. I succeeded the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], who had had both a janitor and a clerk. The janitor received $60 a month for the whole year. As soon as I came in I dismissed the janitor, and I think all the janitors of these committees have since then been dismissed.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I had no janitor and I had no clerk when I was chairman of the committee referred to, and I never knew of anybody having had such a perquisite previous to my having been made chairman of that committee.

Mr. HARDY. As soon as we got clerks we conducted investigations for days and weeks.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am not criticizing that at all. I simply say that to my knowledge there has been very little active work done by any of these committees. The gentleman refers to Mr. Boutell, of Illinois, who was a former Member of the House, and he may have been more active in securing a clerk or a janitor than others were, because I did not see any need for them at that time and I do not see any need for clerks or janitors for these committees at the present time.

Mr. SEARS. Does not the gentleman believe that the chairman of an expenditure committee owes it to the Members of the House and to himself and to the country to investigate these matters?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, yes, if occasion should require.

Mr. SEARS. His party being in power?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, yes, as before stated.

Mr. HASTINGS. How could a committee on expenditures conduct an investigation without having a clerk?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I think if I wanted to investigate I would use the services of my own clerk, and if I required more assistance I would demonstrate the necessity for it. But there was no need of an investigation at that time. Nobody complained, and there was no expectation that any of these committees would do any work. They were simply honorary positions. They made a man perhaps more prominent at home, being chairman of a committee. I recollect receiving a letter once when I was chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, saying how important I was, being connected with so great a department. I did not realize the importance of the committee then. I do not see any importance in these committees to-day, and these clerkships will be mere sinecures if they are provided now. They were not provided at any time while I was a member of one of these committees, and I served 10 years or more as a member of the committee named, part of the time as chairman and part of the time as an ordinary member.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to find out the parliamentary status. There was a statement made with reference to this debate. There was a request made some time ago.

The SPEAKER. The request was carried, and the gentleman from Texas was allowed five minutes, the gentleman from Massachusetts five minutes, the gentleman from New York seven minutes and five minutes, and the gentleman from Georgia has five minutes left. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] used his time, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] used his time, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] had five minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] used his time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Illinois wishes to submit a request. I do not mind waiting.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. MANN. That I have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the time be extended five minutes and that he have five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have five minutes. I do not object to the gentleman's request.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he submit his request afterwards.

Mr. WINGO. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would not have spoken on this subject at all except for what has been said about these expenditure committees.

Expenditure committees have existed for a great many years. As a general thing they are not active. An expenditure committee is very likely to be active when the House comes in with a party majority on one side, while the administration of the opposite party remains in power. But there have been a number of times since I have been a Member of this House when various of the expenditure committees, because of some things that have taken place in the departments, have become very active, and have done some very effective service to the House and to the country. While the Republicans had charge of the national administration and while they had charge of the House investigations have been carried on in some of the departments, since I have been a Member, and those investigations were not only very interesting but very instructive and resulted in considerable economy. Probably the one that took the longest time was the one connected with the Agricultural Department, one investigation conducted by Mr. Littlefield, and I think one conducted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

I would not ever be in favor of abolishing these committees. I myself do not believe that it is advisable to have these committees making investigations of the departments at the present time. I consulted with some gentlemen on the Democraic side in reference to that matter, perhaps several times.

We are undergoing the greatest revolution in government which this country has ever seen. It is on account of the war, and temporary, I hope, but possibly part of it will be permanent. Every department of the Government, at least every department connected with the war or with transportation, manufacturing, or production is being upset and reorganized in a way. I do not believe it is desirable to have half a dozen Members of the House poking their noses into the efforts to reorganize the departments, keeping every man in authority on the tenterhooks as to what he can do for fear he will be criticized in Congress. They have trouble and fear enough. One of the great defects in preparing for the war is that we have not made sufficient preparation because the executive departments have been afraid to go ahead too fast for fear that they will be criticized.

Doubtless there will be some investigation by committees. I have no doubt that there will be, even while the Democrats are in control of the House and the administration. It is very certain, from the very nature of the events, that there would be an investigation if in the next Congress the Republicans came into control of the House while the Democrats were in control of the National Government; not for the purpose of finding fault, but it is a part of the evolution of politics and political control. Whether there ought to be clerks appointed to these committees I am not going to express an opinion. I can not see what need there is for the committees to have clerks. As a rule, they have had clerks in the past.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. My attention has been called to the fact that I said in answer to the gentleman that I did not expect to make any investigation during this Congress. I meant to say this session.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman and that he had reference to this session.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, although it seems like a voice crying in the wilderness, I was glad to hear the gentleman from New York and others employ the rather unusual word "economy" in this House. There is no class of work assigned to any committee connected with this House more useful than the particular line of duty that has been put on the committees on expenditures. They ought to watch them, watch them persistently, and I am personally a little more jealous of that watchfulness during the incumbency of my party than I am at other times, and that, it seems to me, is the view that all men ought to take.

There was a time in the history of this House when a distinguished gentleman, chairman of one of these committees, made an investigation that developed results of supreme importance. It uncovered a great deal of extravagance and dishonesty in the administration of affairs of one of the great departments of the Government. There are only one or two Members connected with the House who were in public life at the time, but which I have no doubt on a little reflection will occur to the minds of most Members.

I was a little bit surprised, Mr. Speaker, and no little gratified, to hear this plea for economy come from the capital of the great State of New York. I had not thought that the training of the public men of that particular region in that great State had inclined them to economy. If it has, then they have been slandered by the public press. Nevertheless, the necessity for it is so great that I am delighted to have an ally in an effort to save some of the people's money no matter from what part of the country it comes.

Unless the promise we had in yesterday's paper by Hudson Maxim that he has found an answer to the submarine puzzle should prove to be true, I think we are in for a very long and tremendously expensive war. Already we have made appropriations here that call for considerably more than the total cost of the Civil War in the United States, which lasted for four years, and it behooves us now to watch the expenditures in all the departments of the country, not with the idea that we are going to find anybody dishonest, not with the idea that people are stealing, but with the idea that wastefulness goes on all the time, as everybody knows that it does, in the administration of public affairs. That, I may say in passing, is why I have no sympathy with the Socialists—that these duties should be assumed by the people as a whole. They could not do it as efficiently, they could not do it as economically, as the individual does. It would lead to extravagance and waste. We see that illustrated every day in the public life of Washington and in the administration of affairs of the Government.

Then we are confronted with another danger. We are getting too many allies. I tremble when I pick up the morning paper lest I may find that Monte Carlo or San Marino or Abyssinia has declared itself an ally, because I know that within 48 hours a representative of that Government will turn up at the State Department and ask for a loan. [Laughter.] Of course, we are glad to have the physical assistance of the great and independent Republic of Liberia, but was it not significant, and is it not a warning, that within 48 hours after that Republic had declared war on the German Empire the single diplomatic and official representative of that country, the consul at Baltimore, should have come over and asked for his part of the loan? [Laughter and applause.] Think of the demands of Haiti and Santo Domingo, and all other pickaninny republics! Can we afford more allies?

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. [Laughter.] I had something more to say.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have just a word further to say in reference to this subject. It seems to me that I have called the attention of the House to what is essential with reference to this matter. The question now is, Does the House desire to authorize for the 11 committees a clerk without knowing or caring whether there is need for a clerk, or does the House take the position that the investigation here to-day, without any information furnished by the committee, is sufficient to warrant the expenditure of this money.

The chairman of the Committee on Accounts, so far from explaining the situation to you, has read the names of the chairmen of the several committees and has said that they will explain the necessity for these clerks or that they may explain. It seems to me that no more has been explained here after an hour or two of debate concerning this necessity than there was to the Committee on Accounts, and there was no explanation or information given there worthy of the name.

The only gentleman who has here specifically referred to himself as the chairman of one of these committees is the gentleman who says that he does not want and will not have a clerk, even if we give him one. It seems to me that this presents a matter of personal responsibility. I do not wish even at this time to oppose the expenditure of money for any necessary purpose. It is not, as some of the gentlemen have tried to infer, a political question. I do not understand the reference of the learned gentleman who just spoke, who said that he was surprised that the gentleman from New York State would appear in favor of economy. I will say to the gentleman that if he ever has the opportunity to travel and will come to the city where I live he will find there the best government and the most honest government in the United States [applause], and he will find that it is a place where we pay no attention to the references and inferences that he makes and where we are ready to face the facts all of the time.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. If the Republican members of these committees on expenditures do not push the matter and insist upon hearings, they can not claim any political ammunition from it, can they?

Mr. SANFORD. I will say to the gentleman that he will have to excuse me from talking politics at this time. There is no politics in this matter at all. The Republicans on these committees are so much in the minority that they do not amount to anything, anyway, and most of them get shut off, as I got shut off on this committee, if they take a minute to ask for the facts. The minority Republicans amount to nothing, but I do not care anything about that. If the gentleman will meet me on these facts and say that he will spend money when he has a good reason for it and refrain from spending money when he has no reason, I will cooperate with him as an American and as a Member of this Congress and hold up my head and face anybody. [Applause.]

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. When the gentleman refers to Republicans on his own committee he does not refer to members on the other committees?

Mr. SANFORD. On the committees where I have had anything to do with the expenditure of money.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman has stated here that only one man appeared and he has left the impression here that some of us did not appear. It was his own fault——

Mr. SANFORD. I said that only one man was heard.

Mr. LOBECK. It was his own fault as a member of the gentleman's committee that the chairmen of these committees could not be heard.

Mr. SANFORD. I decline to yield further. I am sorry to see any feeling with reference to this matter.

Mr. LOBECK. There is no feeling at all.

Mr. SANFORD. I am not yielding to the gentleman at all. I am glad to say that the gentleman demanded a hearing before our committee, but was not given one. I meant to say that only one man was heard, though two or three more came there.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. PARK. Does not the majority of a committee control?

Mr. SANFORD. I think so.

Mr. PARK. A motion was made to pass this resolution, and certainly the Chair had to put it, and it was put and passed regularly, was it not?

Mr. SANFORD. I want to say here, if the gentleman will permit me, that I have a very high regard for the good intentions of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, but I believe he himself is powerless to prevent the expenditure of money like this, while there are many Members in the House who want the money expended. I believe the chairman of this committee started in on the performance of his duties on the committee with a desire to see that money should not be expended by this committee unless there was good reason for it. I am sorry that the gentleman found himself overridden and that he was unable to carry out his intentions. I had a working agreement, if the gentleman will permit me to say so, with the gentleman that we would operate together to prevent this kind of thing being done, but I do not know what the reason is that this resolution is here.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended so that I may have five minutes on this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has already made a request to extend the time for five minutes, and the Chair declined to put it at that time. If the two gentlemen combine for 10 minutes and make the request, the Chair will put it to the House.

Mr. RAKER. I do not want to have mine interfere with anyone else.

The SPEAKER. It does not interfere. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the time be extended for 10 minutes, that he have five minutes and the gentleman from California 5 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand it, the gentleman from California is the chairman of one of these committees?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. He is the only chairman except the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] who has responded.

Mr. RAKER. I have been trying to, and I would like to have the opportunity.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman ought to have the opportunity.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am the chairman of one of these committees, and I would like to have two minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will make my request for 12 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the debate being extended for 12 minutes, the gentleman from California to have 5 minutes and the gentleman from Arkansas 5 minutes and the gentleman from North Carolina 2 minutes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania five minutes.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to any more extensions of time. It is time to get through with this one way or the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will construe that to be an objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PARK. Yes; except the chairman of these little committees; and if they want to speak, I am willing to have them speak.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time except one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the time be extended 12 minutes, 5 to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], 5 to himself, and 2 to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to get about two minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is the chairman of a committee and ought to have some time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am much obliged to the gentleman, but I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] may have five minutes. I think that was almost practically agreed upon a while ago.

Mr. WINGO. I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I appreciate his kindness—and I do not say that in a critical way—but if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who so seldom speaks, is objecting I do not care to have the request submitted again.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. The chairman of the committee does not wish to have men speak in favor of the proposition?

Mr. PARK. There is no use of taking up all day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I think it is regrettable that politics has been injected into this question. In my opinion politics has no place in it.

In the beginning I wish to say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] has just left the reasonable inference to be drawn from his remarks that the chairman of the Committee on Accounts is opposed to this resolution, whereas such is not the case. A few years ago I undertook to have the Committee on the District of Columbia granted authority to inquire into certain accounts. That proposition at that time met with much opposition; but finally the resolution passed. Under that and succeeding resolutions the Committee on the District of Columbia has caused to be paid into the Treasury of the United States more than $2,500,000. I can not but believe that these committees which here to-day have been classified as "little" committees can render equally as important a service if the work will be once seriously undertaken. It is my judgment that instead of having session clerks each of these committees should have a competent clerk, and he should be an annual one.

Much stress has been laid upon the fact that these committees have not held meetings or hearings. I do not believe that either meetings or hearings held by these committees will amount to anything unless they have a clerk competent to go into books and accounts and unearth fraud or extravagance, if there be any. They ought to have clerks competent for the task, and they ought to be annual clerks. I speak from experience when I say that the Committee on the District of Columbia, in finding the $2,500,000 which already has been collected, and in finding more which yet will be collected, has found the greater part of that sum of money during vacation time, when Congress was not in session, and it has found it without a single hearing. The clerks of these committees on expenditures should have a man capable of digging into these accounts, and his chairman should stand behind him day and night and help him to dig.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. I agree with the gentleman in his idea entirely, but he does not believe these committees could secure such a man for $125 a month?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is impossible; but they can get some sort of talent at that, a man who is capable, at least, of getting together suspicious items, and then having an expert afterwards go into them. Where a chairman says he does not want a clerk because he has not had a meeting of his committee, and does not expect to have one, he ought not to undertake thereby to handicap the chairmen of other committees who are anxious and willing to go into the work. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the time may be extended for five minutes, and that he have the five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing of these committees except my own, the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and I am not chairman of that.

I do not agree with some gentlemen that this is a time that we should keep quiet. I think that if there is any time on earth when an expenditure committee should be active it is at this time. I do not think that those in authority would take it as any reflection upon them to have representatives of the legislative department, its regular constituted committees on expenditures, discharge their duties actively. I think standing committees on expenditures are necessary, for the reason that the appointment of special committees is sometimes taken as a reflection upon the departments that are to be investigated, when, as a matter of fact, the men at the head of the departments may not be to blame. For illustration, we will take the present condition with reference to the War Department. I do not believe that there is a single man in the War Department in an administrative capacity that is other than a patriot and is doing and will do his very best to see that the money is expended wisely and properly. But these men are weighed down with a load of work at this time. We must remember that in every war the condition has been the same. The very moment we declared war the stealing began. There were gentlemen who when the Spanish-American War came on thought investigations should proceed contemporaneously with the expenditure, but other gentlemen said that it was not the time; that it would be a reflection upon somebody, and the result was a scandal. I say that as a protection to the men in these different departments the committees on expenditures ought to discharge their duty and actively assist them and get busy now. I candidly believe that in the War Department those men, as careful as they may be, as honest as they may be, working, some of them, overtime, are being overreached by grafters, who take advantage of the fact that the officials, on account of the rush of matters, can not investigate as carefully as they would in peace time.

I think the work of these men would be helped and their labors relieved to a great extent if the expenditure committee of this House would keep up with the expenditures. The very fact that an expenditure committee of this House was checking up these matters would be a check upon the grafters that are trying to overreach the departments at this time. Some gentlemen may be so credulous as to believe that the grafters do not get busy when war comes. They are swarming around this Capital now, anxious to take advantage of the war conditions and the rush and lack of efficient buying and inspection caused thereby.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. WINGO. Not just now. The fact that they know these men in the executive departments have not the time to go into details, as they would do in time of peace, is taken advantage of. They are taking advantage of that fact, and the Government is being robbed at this moment in a manner that might be checked and prevented if the expenditures were checked up all the time.

Gentlemen say, "If you know any facts, why not introduce a resolution to investigate?" That moment I fear you would check the activities of good men in the departments, who would feel that their conduct was under suspicion. To avoid that we ought to have a regularly organized committee which has been selected in time of peace to go on with its duties.

These committees either ought to be abolished or they ought to go to work. [Applause.] If they go to work they should have the proper clerical assistance.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman think that the same effect would be had if one of these committees would subpœna officials from the War Department or the Navy Department or the State Department and bring them up here to the Capitol?

Mr. WINGO. I would say to the gentleman this, that personally I would hesitate now to worry the War Department by necessary inquiries, even though I am a member of that expenditure committee. The thing I have in mind is that it will require special authority for these committees. It may be they have the authority the gentleman suggests now, but I doubt if it would be sustained if it were resisted. The members of that committee ought to go to other sources. I am satisfied that everything is correct down in the departments, so far as the officials are concerned. The only information the committee would need for the present is information that can be obtained at the places where the supplies are bought and where the inspection is had, to know whether the inspection is proper and how much the supplies cost. It is not the department that should be investigated, but the grafters who are overreaching the War Department. Those are the ones I want to reach. [Applause.] An investigation by these standing committees, without any hurrah, but along proper and efficient lines, will help the departments and check the grafters who, like vultures, are hovering around the Capital.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I want to withdraw the amendment relating to the clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PARK. I demand a division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 243, answered "present" 2, not voting 86, as follows:

"THE CALL TO ARMS."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a poem written by Emma Hamilton Bulloch, of Georgia, entitled "The Call to Arms," dedicated to President Woodrow Wilson.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The poem referred to is as follows:

"THE CALL TO ARMS."

(The Marseillaise of America.)

DEDICATED TO PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON.

[Words by Emma Hamilton Bulloch, of Georgia; music by Wilmuth Gary.]

To arms, to arms, beloved country,
With thy starry flag unfurled
And thy shield of honor stainless,
Give this message to the world:
Lofty principles of justice,
Peace, and freedom for mankind
Do not mean a craven spirit,
As all traitors soon will find.

CHORUS.

Here we pledge to thee, our President,
Our unswerving loyalty;
We will give allegiance only
To our God, our flag, and thee.

To arms, to arms, beloved country,
For the cause of liberty;
Hold the torch of justice Heav'nward
'Till it flashes o'er the sea
And proclaims to all the nations
That on this they can depend,
We love peace but not dishonor
And the right we will defend.

To arms, to arms, beloved country,
With thy armor shining bright
And thy sword unsheathed and ready
To strike boldly for the right.
We love all mankind as brothers,
But 'tis best they understand
On the shores of this fair country
Hostile feet must never land.

To arms, to arms, beloved country,
Duty calls, we must obey;
Freedom of the world imperiled
By a despot's iron sway.
We must help to crush forever
Greed and tyranny and hate;
Love and liberty must triumph.
Strike, it is the hour of fate!

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls up the conference report on the Military Academy appropriation bill. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, having met, after full and further free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 6 of the bill strike out all on line 18 and in lieu thereof insert the following: "38 privates, first class, and 38 privates, $15,080"; and Senate agree to the same.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
Managers on the part of the House.
GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The House receded from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1, providing extra pay for 19 enlisted men instead of for 13, as provided in the House bill. Although without authority, as the matter was not in conference, the conferees took the liberty of striking out the words "76 privates at $15 each per month, $13,680," and substituting therefor "38 privates, first class, and 38 privates, $15,080." This change was made upon the recommendation of the Engineer Department, which stated that the language originally used would tend to disrupt the present organization.

The House receded from amendments 2 and 3, authorizing the President to appoint William Harold Kehoe and Clyde R. Altman, late cadets at the Military Academy at West Point, to the position of second lieutenant of Infantry and to place them on the retired list with the pay of a retired second lieutenant.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DENT. I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MASON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. TALBOTT, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when the committee rose on this bill before, the first section had been read.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAUGEN offers the following: Insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person to commit or permit preventable waste or deterioration of any necessaries, to hoard, or to hold, or enter into any contract or arrangement for any necessaries in excess of an amount reasonably needed to supply his individual or business requirements for a reasonable time; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any such necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair or any deceptive practice or device in handling or dealing in or with such necessaries; to enter into any contract, arrangement, or conspiracy to restrict the supply, or, except as permitted by law, for preventing gluts and for effecting equitable apportionment of perishable products among markets, to restrict distribution, or to enhance the prices of any such necessaries; to exact excessive prices for any such necessaries; or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section. Any person who violates any provision of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane—unless the gentleman desires me to reserve it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, no; just a word to the point of order The purpose of the bill, as stated in the title, is to provide further for the national defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

I know of no better way in which we can stimulate production and encourage agriculture than by doing away with the evils of speculation and the manipulation of prices. The subject matter of my amendment, offered as a new section to the bill, is dealt with in the various provisions of the bill.

The section I am offering is identical with the one that was prepared by the department and incorporated in the bill introduced by the chairman of the committee [Mr. LEVER]. I think there can be no question but that it is in order.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed, in the first place, that this is not an amendment to any particular section of the bill. The amendment itself is a new section. The point raised by the chairman of the committee is that it is not germane to the bill. In order to determine that question I want to call the attention of the chairman, in the first place, to the distinctions that are made with regard to this class of cases. If the chairman will turn to pages 344 and 345 of the Digest and Manual, he will find an excellent summary of the difference between these classes of cases. It will be observed, in the first place, that one individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition, even though the two belong to the same class. It could not be held that this amendment belongs to that class of exclusion. It is not offered to amend one individual proposition by offering another.

I now call attention of the Chair to the second excluded class, found on page 345. A specific subject may not be amended by a provision generally, even when one of the class of specific subjects. That is another rule which will not apply in this case. A specific subject is not intended to be amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. It is not intended to take a specific subject and enlarge or extend its application to other particular subjects.

But if the Chair will turn to the third class I think it will be found that the amendment is clearly within these classes there enumerated which are not subject to the objection. A general subject may be amended by a specific proposition of the same class. Instances are given which are familiar to the Chair. Thus the following are germane: To a bill proposing the admission of several Territories into the Union an amendment for the admission of another Territory is germane, whereas it had been held previously that to add one Territory to a bill making provision for the admission of a single Territory was within the excluded class. That very clearly makes the distinction that I think exists in this case. Other cases are given: To a bill providing for the construction of buildings in each of two cities an amendment providing for similar building in other cities is germane, to a resolution embodying two distinct phases of international relationship an amendment embodying a third is germane.

These instances are cited to show what has been held to be the rule where a provision or a bill is general in its character and an individual proposition of the same general character is proposed.

Now, let us see how these principles apply to this particular bill. The bill in its first section, among other things, defines the specific objects of the bill. Not a singular object and purpose, but objects and purposes of very great variety and extent. It is stated in this first section that these specified objects and purposes are designed to provide for the national security and defense and for carrying on the war with Germany by gathering information concerning food supplies and by increasing production. Of course, this amendment could have no effect upon any of those objects and purposes, but notice this: "To prevent waste of the food supply." One of the specific objects of this amendment offered is to prevent waste. The section further provides that the bill is to be made operative and effective by "regulating distribution." How can distribution be regulated except by means such as the amendment supplies?

So, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that the objects and purposes of this bill are not singular but varied and general in their character, and the amendment being applicable to one or more of these general propositions should be considered germane.

I want to call attention particularly to some of the classes that are specified in the bill. Section 3 has relation to food control, and one of the particular objects of this particular amendment offered is for the purpose of strengthening and making effectual the supply and control of food in the United States. Section 4 is to secure the distribution of seeds. I do not think this amendment would apply to that section. Section 9, however, is for the eradication of diseases of live stock, and it is defined as one of the purposes of this act. It certainly is appropriate to enforce the provision of that section. The paragraph following, and I desire particularly to call attention to the language of this, page 6, second paragraph:

For increased food production and eliminating waste and promoting the conservation of food.

That is declared to be one of the objects and purposes of the bill. It is stated that this is to be done by the department sending out agents, and the amendment provides another way that will eliminate waste and promote the conservation of food.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. In line 7 the bill states that it is for regulating the distribution. Does the gentleman mean to say that the amendment is not germane?

Mr. TOWNER. I am arguing that it is.

Mr. JUUL. I have been thinking all the time that the gentleman is arguing the other way. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNER. I hope the chairman of the committee will not be deceived, as my friend has evidently been by the course of my remarks.

Mr. JUUL. I apologize to the gentleman, but both myself and my friend from Illinois thought that the gentleman was trying to destroy the amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the next paragraph, where it is specially stated that one of the objects and purposes of this bill and for which we are asked to appropriate $3,500,000, is to prevent waste of food products in storage. Certainly an amendment that would enforce that, that would strengthen that, must be considered as germane to the bill. So that all through this bill there are many provisions to which this amendment will apply in making effective and enforcing the declared objects and purposes of the bill. The bill is not singular in its nature, it is general and varied in its character, and this amendment applies to many of the provisions that are contained in the bill. The rule that a bill general in character may be amended by a specific proposition of the same character certainly applies in this case. I do not think the point of order made by the gentleman from South Carolina is well taken.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it is probably true that the title of this bill does not entirely indicate what is in the bill. It is probably true also that section 1, or the preamble, does not entirely state the purposes of the bill. The Chair will have to examine the various sections of the bill to determine what is undertaken to be accomplished by it. If the Chair will examine section 3, he will find that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make a food inventory of the United States, to ascertain, through an investigation, the food situation in this country. There is not a word, not a line, in section 3 which is directed to the prevention of waste, hoarding, or speculation, or to any other proposition contained in the amendment offered by my friend from Iowa, as I caught its meaning as it was read from the desk. If the Chair will examine section 4, he will find that that section gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to purchase and store seeds, and to sell these seeds under certain conditions and for certain purposes. There is not a word, not a line, not a syllable, in that section which goes to the matter of prevention of waste, hoarding, or speculation, or anything of the kind such as is contained in the amendment now pending. Section 5 authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with individuals, corporations, and State and local officials, and there is not a word in that section to which this amendment could be attached and to which it would be germane. Section 6 provides that the President of the United States may appoint two additional Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture. Certainly there is nothing in that section to which the amendment could be attached and be germane. Section 7 authorizes the President to coordinate the activities of the various agencies of the Government. There is nothing in that section to which this amendment could be germane. Section 8 defines the meaning of the word "person," and certainly the gentleman from Iowa would not contend that section 8 could be a section to which his amendment might be held germane. Section 9 is the appropriating section of the bill, appropriating money to do certain things, and that is all there is to section 9. The committee has segregated a lump sum estimated by the Secretary of Agriculture, and has specified the purposes for which these appropriations, as fixed in the bill, may be expended. I want to direct the Chair's attention to the fact that an amendment, if I understand the rule, must be germane to the purposes of the bill, not to the title nor to the preamble of the bill. It is true that the title does say, "To provide for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. The title does not properly convey the exact purposes of the bill. The title to this bill is a title to a joint resolution which was introduced some time ago by myself for the very proposition which the gentleman from Iowa is offering as an amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. In a minute. But the committee divided the two bills and did not change the title of this bill, so that the Chair must look to the provisions of the bill to understand the purposes of the bill. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if it could be shown that a set of men in this country were conspiring to do the very opposite of what this bill seeks to do, whether any amendment that would aid and facilitate the distribution of agricultural products, which the gentleman's bill seeks to do, would not be germane to the bill?

Mr. LEVER. I am afraid the gentleman does not know what this bill is seeking to do.

Mr. JUUL. I am now looking at the gentleman's bill and reading its title.

Mr. LEVER. I have been arguing to the Chair that you can not tell what is under a man's clothing by looking at the clothing. I am arguing to the Chair that you have to determine the purposes of the bill, not by its title but by the sections which carry out its purpose.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will permit me, I maintain this, that the gentleman shows the membership of this Congress what is in his bill first by its title, and if the title is broad enough, if the title indicates to me that you seek to facilitate the distribution of agricultural products, then I maintain that anything that helps to facilitate that is germane.

Mr. LEVER. I am afraid the gentleman is remembering his experience in the legislature of his own State, where I am told that the title of the bill must express all there is in the bill. The rule here does not require that.

Mr. JUUL. I am free to tell the gentleman that I think any honest bill should do that.

Mr. LEVER. Probably so; and the title to the present bill is an appropriate one. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that the amendment offered as a new section was incorporated in the gentleman's bill, with a few exceptions? I have introduced a section incorporated in the last bill, and there is a slight change, of course, in the verbiage.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is absolutely correct in that statement. The bill that was introduced by me the day before yesterday—H. R. 4630—in substance contains what the gentleman from Iowa is offering, but the Committee on Agriculture has not considered that bill as yet, except to have hearings upon it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, well, we considered the first bill, and we reported the bill with the amendment in it, and the bill was recalled, and the amendment stricken from the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Probably so; but that would have nothing to do with the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair is not ready to rule, I would like to be indulged for just a moment. The rule provides that no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Under that rule the philosophy relating to germaneness has been developed. Now, we do not look to the title of this bill to determine what the proposition under consideration is. We look to the contents of the bill itself. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has already gone over the bill section by section, with a view of stating exactly what is involved in each proposition.

Now, what does the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] do? It does not facilitate, as section 3 does, the obtaining of certain information relative to the food supply. It proposes 8 or 9 or 10 or a dozen new crimes. It is purely a criminal statute. It proposes to create new crimes which are in no way directly or indirectly connected with the subject matter of this bill. For instance, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa proposes to make it a crime to monopolize food. There is not a single word in this bill about monopoly.

The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa makes it a crime to enhance the price of food. There is not a word in this bill about regulating the price of food. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, as I recall it, makes it a crime to engage in any unfair or discriminatory practices. Not a word in this bill about discriminatory or unfair practices. It makes it a crime to enter into a contract, arrangement, or conspiracy to restrict the supply of food. Not a word in this bill relative to the restricting of the supply of food. There may be propositions in the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa which are germane to the bill, but there are also contained in his amendment propositions which are not germane to the bill, and which do not relate to the subject matter thereof.

It seems to me that the amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. In line 7 of the bill, not contained in the title, but in the first section of the bill, lines 7 and 8, it says:

By regulating the distribution thereof.

How can you regulate the distribution of food products without attaching penalties? Is there any method by which any enforcement of regulation can be made except by attaching penalties, I will ask the gentleman?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not regard the first section of this bill as legislative at all. It is simply declaratory of the purposes of the bill. It is not regulatory in any particular. There are, in fact, no regulatory provisions in the bill whatever.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. ELSTON. Is it contemplated by any amendment to the bill or any bill to be introduced by the Committee on Agriculture that the subject matter of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will be included?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is contemplated that the amendment proposed, in substance, by the gentleman from Iowa will be considered by the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. ELSTON. That is in consideration in the committee?

Mr. ANDERSON. In connection with another bill, which is regulatory in its character.

Mr. NORTON. Would the gentleman maintain that if this section were offered in the committee—section 1, providing for the purposes of more effectually carrying on the war by regulating the distribution of food and by preventing waste of the food supply—that the section would not be in order?

Mr. ANDERSON. I simply say that I do not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is germane to this bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Of what avail is it to raise the crops if the prices are such that the poor can not buy them?

Mr. ANDERSON. That does not relate at all to the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the Chair's attention to the fact that the bill relates to the production of agricultural products. The gentleman occupying the chair is familiar with the rulings of the past.

He will recall that in the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill points of order were made against appropriations for the distribution of farm products. I believe that it has been uniformly held that any amendment dealing with the distribution of agricultural products is as much in order as one dealing with production. I called the chairman's attention to the rulings of the Chair in the consideration of the items appropriating money for the Division of Markets. By going through the various sections of the bill the Chair will find that the matters covered in my amendment are germane to the provisions in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] does not offer his amendment to any particular section of the bill, but as a new section, and puts it on the ground that it is germane to the subject matter of the bill.

A hasty examination of the amendment leads the Chair to conclude it deals with waste, hoarding, monopolizing, unfair and deceptive practices, restricting of supplies, and restricting of distribution. The bill itself, as it appears, deals with the question of authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and ascertain the demand for and supply, and so forth, of foodstuffs, and for the purchase and sale of seeds, cooperation with local officials, the appointment of additional secretaries, and that the President is authorized to ask any agency or organization of the Government to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out these purposes, and for the purposes of this act the following sums are hereby appropriated, and so forth.

Now, it seems to the Chair that while this amendment is somewhat in line with the purposes of this bill, and related to them, but I find in the rules these propositions laid down:

Two subjects are not necessarily germane because they are related. Thus the following have been held not to be germane: To a proposition relating to the terms of Senators, an amendment changing the manner of their election; to a bill relating to commerce between the States, an amendment relating to commerce within the several States; to a proposition to relieve destitute citizens of the United States in Cuba, a proposition declaring a state of war in Cuba and proclaiming neutrality.

And yet they did relate to each other.

There is another proposition I would call the gentleman's attention to. If any portion of the amendment is not germane, of course the whole amendment must go out.

There is a portion of this amendment that does relate to food distribution and waste, but there are incorporated in the amendment certain matters that certainly are not referred to in the bill nor germane thereto. The Chair thinks, therefore, that it is not in order on this bill, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Has the Clerk read simply the first paragraph of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. He read the first section.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He is over to section 2?

The CHAIRMAN. He read up to section 2.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I desire to be recognized to make a motion to strike out section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota moves to strike out section 1.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, as soon as I could conveniently do so I secured a copy of this bill, because it is one that every State is interested in and every Member of Congress likewise. I read the first and second sections of this bill with amazement, trying to find some possible connection between them and the rest of the bill, and I was unable to do so.

I see the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], the chairman of the committee having charge of the bill, is temporarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, I see him now. He has changed his place. I want to ask him a question, if I may.

Mr. LEVER. Very well.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not want to injure the bill or the purposes of the bill or in any way mar it; but does not the gentleman think that that first section could be cut out greatly to the benefit of the bill?

Mr. LEVER. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I believe that this bill is constitutional with that section not in it, and also possibly section 2 is unnecessary. They are the residue, I may say, of a joint resolution which was introduced under pressure for time, and personally, without having consulted the lawyers on the Committee on Agriculture, I think both sections 1 and 2 might go out without at all affecting the bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thank the gentleman very much for his frank statement. I will say to him that if those two sections are retained they will produce some difficulty. If a court is ever called upon to construe the act—and doubtless the courts will be called upon many times to construe it—there will be confusion raised in the courts of the land when the courts read the first section, which is a statement of that which the bill is going to do, and then later on the courts try to find some place in the bill where that which is claimed to be done is done, and doubt and uncertainty will arise.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the first section do anything but state the fact that there is an emergency?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. As near as I can tell, the first section does nothing but express a state of mind.

Mr. MANN. Well, it attempts to cover doubtful matters in the bill into a class of legalities by referring to the war, but it does not itself grant any power.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thought the purpose of the section doubtless was, when I first picked up the bill, to confine the operations of the act to the existing war. But I find that is not the case.

Mr. MANN. That is done in the last section.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand; but the section does not do that, even if it is done elsewhere in the bill.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Minnesota will permit, I will say that the committee had in mind, in drawing the original resolution, the idea that the constitutionality of that resolution might be attacked, and we therefore predicated the resolution upon the war power of Congress. But I am satisfied in my own mind, from what little I have been told about the legality of this bill, that the bill can be sustained without any reference to the war power of Congress, and, as I said a moment ago, those two sections are the residue of the original resolution.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the act is sustained it will not be by reason of any power contained in that first section.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me to make one suggestion, I may say that the first section is in effect a "whereas" preceding the second section. That is the effect of it. If the second section remains in the bill, probably the first section ought to remain. If the second section is stricken out of the bill, there is no particular occasion for the "whereas" in the first section. The first section lays the ground for granting the authority which really is granted in the second section.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In that connection I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the second section is so exceedingly vague in its phraseology that the meaning is doubtful, and the court might readily determine that no power was conveyed by that section which the Secretary of Agriculture did not already have.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think as to the second section that if you pass the second section with the first section and give the Secretary of Agriculture the money he would own the earth, so far as the United States is concerned.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, that may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. The gentleman speaks of the "vague" portions of the first section. Will the gentleman indicate the portions that he considers vague?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman means the portions of the first section that have no direct relation with the balance of the bill or the contents of the bill?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. For instance, about preventing waste of the food supply and particularly "by regulating the distribution thereof." There is nothing whatever in the bill, as has already been pointed out and admitted, which gives any authority or prescribes any conduct the object of which is to regulate the distribution of food supplies in the country.

Mr. KING. How about the question of seeds? Does he regulate the distribution and gathering of seeds?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly the distribution of seeds is not a distribution of food supply.

Mr. KING. It is related.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It may be related to the production of food, but it has nothing to do with the distribution of foods.

Mr. TOWNER. The mere declaration that a certain power is conferred because of the existence of war, if it is not constitutional otherwise, or if inherently it is not a war power, would not strengthen it, would it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Absolutely not.

Mr. TOWNER. So that the mere declaration that this legislation is enacted because of the existing war with Germany would not strengthen the positions of the bill, if they were not within the war powers of the Government.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly not.

Mr. TOWNER. Or within the constitutional powers of the Government?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly not.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly. I am simply holding the floor in order to enable gentlemen to express themselves on this.

Mr. LENROOT. I would not like to assent to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] in just the form in which he states it. There might be a given thing that would exist independently, and yet by the declaration and finding of Congress might be so attached to the war power as to make it valid if Congress so found by declaration, which otherwise would not be. Is not that true?

Mr. TOWNER. Inherently it would have to be within the war powers of the Government, as we call them, would it not?

Mr. LENROOT. There would have to be some connection, but the courts would not find it as a fact if it came within certain limits within the discretion of Congress to find it.

Mr. TOWNER. If it was within the limits it would be right; but the war power is a constitutional power, and if it extends to that inherently, and the condition of war really exists, then there would be no doubt about its constitutionality in any event.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. One further observation with reference to section 2, because I think that section ought to be stricken out also. As the gentleman from Illinois just observed, if this section does anything, if it clothes the Secretary with any power by reason of the exceedingly general terms therein used, then the power is almost without limit. If suitable appropriations should be made to enable him to carry out its provisions, of course, there would be almost no limit to that which he could do, wise or unwise. It seems to me the rest of the bill is appropriately concerned with its objects, namely, to stimulate food production by assisting in the distribution of seeds, the procurement of seeds, encouragement of the raising of different kinds of crops, assisting in the prevention of diseases, the destroying of pests that prey upon crops, and things of that kind, all basic, all tending to the common purpose. And if the powers conferred in section 2 are in excess of these other powers, then they are unnecessary.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Section 2 seems to me to give in general terms the specific powers that are conferred in the subsequent sections of the bill, and in addition give the Secretary the power to promote the conservation and utilization, and to facilitate the distribution of foods and seeds. These are very broad powers, and I would like to suggest to the gentleman that I think that section ought to go out, so that we may rely on the specific powers.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that I intend to move to strike that out.

Mr. LENROOT. If the words "to take such measures and to use such means" were stricken out, would it not then leave a valuable power to the Secretary of Agriculture to use all agencies of the department where he may now be restricted by law to an agency being used within a particular field.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I should like to have the gentleman from Wisconsin point out such a circumstance, if one exists.

Mr. LENROOT. I have in mind for instance county agents.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They would not be agencies of the Department of Agriculture, would they?

Mr. LENROOT. County agents of the Department of Agriculture have duties to perform within certain lines, and they might not be permitted to go outside of those lines except for the power that would be granted here.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If there are some agencies of the Department of Agriculture whose activities are restricted to a certain line of conduct, then if the amendment should be made as suggested, the Secretary could use those agencies for any purpose that this bill provided for.

Mr. LENROOT. That is all I had in mind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this whole food question has interested me very much, more especially as the people whom I particularly represent are bearing very heavy burdens now in the matter of the increased price of food. I have read recently in the newspapers of the intent of the President to appoint what is to be known as a food dictator, and since the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has opened up this question, suggesting that paragraph 1 of this bill should be stricken out, and indicating that he might follow it up by moving to strike out the first paragraph of section 2, I desire, partly by way of inquiry, to make a few observations, to which I ask the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] who has been in consultation with our important officials on this subject. A few days ago a circular was sent out, apparently an extract from the New York Globe, dated May 17, which contained an article by Alfred W. McCann, which article, I presume, fell into the hands of all Members of Congress. In this article Mr. McCann, whom I do not know, makes a very elaborate indorsement of Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, whom he calls the "prospective food dictator of the United States," and whom he interviewed in his apartments in the New Willard Hotel. He speaks of Mr. Hoover as being "a tired man, an impatient man, a depressed man, but a strong man," and he enlarges very much upon Mr. Hoover's personal amiabilities and qualifications for the position for which he has been named. But in this article Mr. McCann is made to quote Mr. Hoover as follows:

> I will not be shackled by anybody in the Department of Agriculture, and will not allow a single job hunter or profit monger to help me.
> Patriotic and unselfish men, every one of them working without pay or compensation of any kind, will be my assistants.

Then Mr. McCann goes on in his own language to say:

> He—
> Mr. Hoover—
> spoke with a finality that reflected the present state of mind of the President, who, as was freely rumored in the corridors of the Capitol during the day, no longer reposes full confidence in Secretary Houston or any of the old bureaucrats who for years have worked under cover in the Department of Agriculture.

Now, without vouching for Mr. McCann as to whether he is right or wrong in his observations, or whether he is a responsible writer or not, we have heard much of Mr. Herbert C. Hoover and what he is going to do for the Government of the United States with respect to the control of the food situation, and it appears to me, judging from what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has said, that it may be the intent to exercise the broad power conferred in the paragraph which the gentleman proposes to strike out, and in paragraph 2, for the purpose of engaging the services of such a man as Mr. Herbert C. Hoover——

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. KING. What reason has the gentleman on the unsupported statement of Mr. McCann, whom he never heard of, to put these words into the mouth of Mr. Hoover?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no authority except the report quoted. It happens, however, that two days after this statement was given out, on May 20, the President of the United States is credited with authorizing the announcement that Mr. Hoover would be appointed to this position of food dictator, although that term may not have been used by the President; but at any rate it is stated on May 20 that the President indicated his intention to appoint Mr. Hoover. The Washington Herald states that the official statement was issued at the White House which reads, in part, as follows:

> It is very desirable in order to prevent misunderstandings or alarms and to assure cooperation in a vital matter, that the country should understand exactly the scope and purpose of the very great powers which I have thought it necessary in the circumstances to ask the Congress to put in my hands in regard to our food supply. Those powers are very great, indeed.

Now, is Mr. Hoover to be made food dictator under the powers conferred in paragraph 1 and the first paragraph of section 2 in this bill? Is that the way it shall be done?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That same statement came to my desk, and I presume it did to the desk of many. I read it with a great deal of care and a good deal of interest, because it seemed quite dogmatic because it assumed at least that that was the way it was going to be done, whether Congress was willing or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that the article—the gentleman refers to the McCann article—so far as it quoted Mr. Hoover, is one of the most dogmatic and, if I may be pardoned in spite of the espionage bill, the most arrogant expression that I have recently heard from anyone not in the employ of the Government of the United States.

Mr. FESS. The statement that it would be done without cost of money or without price and so on, I wondered whether it meant that, unofficially, we might have a dictator unsupported by any power of Congress, but by voluntary contributions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The statement issued from the White House tells us somewhat more authoritatively, and I presume it is an authoritative statement, as to Mr. Hoover and what is expected of him.

Mr. FESS. May I ask the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether we are to interpret that as something to be done without an act of Congress or the authorization of Congress?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman asked me that, because that has been troubling my mind. Announcements are appearing in the papers daily about what certain bodies, independent of Congress's authorization, are going to do, expending public money. Only this morning it was announced that under the auspices of an advisory council of the Council of National Defense the task of spending $10,000,000,000 a year is to be imposed on one man, Bernard Baruch by name; that apparently has the sanction of the members of the Council of National Defense, who are composed of Secretaries in the President's Cabinet. The question with me is, How can any body of men spend $10,000,000,000 or any other sum of money without the sanction of the Congress of the United States, which is representative of the taxpayers?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that there would be any difficulty in securing plenty of men, in or out of the penitentiary, who would be willing to expend $10,000,000,000 of the Government money in the purchase of supplies without charging any salary? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We could find plenty of them. I have enough confidence in the regular officials of the Government, who are paid for their services, however, to believe that they are competent to spend any money that Congress may appropriate. I do not believe even in this great emergency it is necessary for the great Government of the United States to go outside to get men to expend vast sums for nothing. It is easier to spend money than it is to sit here in Congress and raise it.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Does the gentleman understand that this man was to expend money of the Government of the United States, or $10,000,000,000, for the allies?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He was to spend it for both, as I understand; for both the United States and for the allies. And inasmuch as the allies are out of funds just now and are getting money from the United States, I assume it will be the money of the people of the United States that Mr. Baruch and his advisory committee desire to expend.

Mr. NOLAN. We already have unanimously provided for that money—$7,000,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; to lend to the allies and pay our own war expenses, but that is not $10,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. NOLAN. It is not our money after it passes into the possession of the allies. Now, I want to ask the gentleman one more question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to raise any question as between the allies and the United States. We have gone into this war business, and we have gone in to win. As to the allies, we have put on the glove they made for us. We are spending our own money to help them, even though they tell us they are fighting our battles.

Mr. NOLAN. We are discussing articles in the newspaper——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A statement that comes from the White House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. NOLAN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to have five minutes more to try to do justice to the White House statement.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 35 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 35 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. I would like to ask the gentleman, outside of any statement that Mr. McCann might make, or that Mr. Hoover might be quoted as making, does not the gentleman think that it is about time in this country that this Government took control of the food situation, considering the fact that prices have been jumping enormously in the last year, due to speculation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but we have an Attorney General's department with ample laws for prosecuting food speculators in the United States. For some reason or other we are not using the machinery the Government now has. We have made appropriations for it, but it is now proposed to go outside, adopt the methods of independent business men and others who come here to tell the Government how to run its business.

Mr. NOLAN. If that is a fact, is it not time that we adopted some other method?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Put that up to your Attorney General's department. You have all of the law you need and all the money you need to prosecute the trusts, but food trusts are not being prosecuted very rapidly under this administration.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman really think that the prosecution of any trust would afford any relief within the next six months?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not arguing against the passage of a measure that will more drastically deal with food combinations at the present time. I want to protect the people who are paying enormously, even outrageously, high prices for food; but I have wondered why the Attorney General's department is not sufficient for this job—why we have to go outside to get these "big brains" in business who are willing to work for nothing.

Mr. KNUTSON. Who is Barney Baruch?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield. In this statement from the White House—and I ask comparison of what I am about to read as coming from the President with those two first paragraphs of the bill——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman know that that issues from the White House?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The personal pronoun "I" is used all through it.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman know who put that in the newspaper?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has anyone denied that the President issued this statement? Does the gentleman deny it?

Mr. HARDY. I do not deny every wild news article that appears in the newspapers nor harp upon it like the gentleman from Pennsylvania does.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is quoted as coming from the White House. You take your bill and compare the first two paragraphs with what I am about to read and we will find out whether Mr. Hoover is intended to meet the situation.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman has read absurdities that ought not to take up the time of children.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman must not take up my time.

Mr. HARDY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman talks about "demagogues" and plays the rôle himself.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman never said anything about it, but I said the gentleman was reading foolish articles.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Compare your first two paragraphs with what I am about to read:

> The objects sought to be served by the legislation asked for are: Full inquiry into the existing available stocks of foodstuffs and into the costs and practices of the various food-producing and distributing trades the prevention of all unwarranted hoarding of every kind and of the control of foodstuffs by persons who are not in any legitimate sense producers, dealers, or traders; the requisitioning when necessary for the public use of food supplies and of the equipment necessary for handling them properly, etc.—

In meaning and purpose almost the exact terms of the two paragraphs in this bill just referred to. Now let the gentleman deny this as coming from the White House:

> I have asked Mr. Herbert Hoover to undertake this all-important task of food administration. He has expressed his willingness to do so on condition that he is to receive no payment for his service and that the whole of the force under him, exclusive of clerical assistants, shall be employed so far as possible upon the same volunteer basis.

That is to say, we are to take men from the colleges and elsewhere, some of whom may be subject to conscription, and put them in the food business, and they are to work for nothing. I know many men who would be glad to work for nothing under Mr. Herbert Hoover if they could avoid the draft. But the point here is that we are to appropriate $19,000,000, or thereabouts, in this bill for this particular food survey, with more to come. If some gentlemen are going to serve the Government for nothing, there is money enough here to pay good salaries to about 7,500 who are willing to receive it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. The statement was made yesterday that Mr. Herbert Hoover is now enrolled as an employee of the Government in the Agricultural Department at $1 a year. Has the gentleman any information as to the truth of that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not; but I would say that Mr. Hoover ought not to work for the Government of the United States for $1 a year. He ought to be paid for his services. It is not fair to laboring men who work for a dollar or a dollar and a half or three dollars per day, or any other sum, that he should work for the Government for nothing.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, Who is Bernard Baruch?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am informed that he is a broker in New York. He was a chief figure in the so-called "leak" investigation and admitted he made a large sum of money—$420,000, I think; a small sum for him, perhaps—as a result of information about the peace negotiations before the war with Germany. But he is said to be an able business man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And, according to the newspapers, he is expected to spend $10,000,000,000 per annum for the Government and the allies without compensation. The taxpayers are to meet that sum, and Congress should know more about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have listened with some indignation to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and also amusement—amusement that he is so anxious to have this dollar a year or three dollars assigned to some laboring man.

I am glad he feels so deeply regarding laboring men, for if there is any one State where they need decent consideration it is in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. LUNN. I will not yield. You are not going to take the time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want the gentleman to yield. His joke is very ancient and subtle.

Mr. LUNN. You should recognize it, because it is so similar to your own.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have heard it so often that it palls.

Mr. LUNN. It reminds me of so many of yours that I am sure it is in good company.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has not heard many of mine. He has been here but a few days.

Mr. LUNN. I have heard about 40 of your jokes during this session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he can not interrupt the gentleman from New York, who has the floor, without his consent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is brilliant, a new Representative from New York——

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will be seated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is entitled to the compliment.

Mr. LUNN. Have I the floor, or has the gentleman from Pennsylvania the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will desist until the Chair reminds the gentlemen of their rights. If the gentleman from

New York [Mr. LUNN] was proceeding outside of the rules, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would know it well, and can call attention to it, but he must not interfere with any man who has the floor without obtaining first the consent of the Chair. [Applause.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] may proceed.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I want to remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], as well as other Members, many of whom do know, but some of them may not, that through the instrumentality of Mr. Baruch, the unusually capable and able chairman, and the members of the National Council of Defense the Government has secured a price for copper around 16 cents, when, as I understand, the market price was somewhere above 30 cents per pound.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I will not yield. I am going to make my statement and you can make yours. There was a saving of millions of dollars, and it was through the work of Mr. Baruch. He also secured a reduction in the price of steel that was tremendously favorable to the Government. It may be the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not like low prices on steel. I want to give credit to the men in the steel industry and the copper industry that they were willing at this time of national crisis to give the Government such favorable prices. I believe they could well afford it, judging from the tremendous profits which they have made during the war. They have made enough during this last two years to contribute millions to defense without one dollar for profit. But they still are going to have profit. At this time, when, as I believe, even the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will acknowledge we are in war, to stand here and talk about the allies making the gloves that we are to wear makes one feel that there is something decidedly wrong. Surely it is time that we all get together on some kind of basis of unified effort to bring about conditions as regards food supply that will be helpful to our citizens regardless of our politics. [Applause.]

It seems to me that this attack on Mr. Hoover, who has made his reputation by actual work in Belgium, is wholly uncalled for. Mr. Hoover is not a man brought out of obscurity; neither are the other gentlemen involved in this attack brought out of obscurity. They are men of ability, and we need every man of humble capacity, as well as every man of unusual capacity, to carry on this great conflict in which we are engaged.

Now, I agree with the gentlemen——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I will yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask one question, or two in one: You say that Mr. Baruch got a price of 16 cents for copper. Do you know that the Utah Copper Co., in its report to its stockholders, declared that they could put copper f. o. b. the cars at 5½ cents a pound?

Mr. LUNN. If that is a fact, and I do not desire to question the statement made by the gentleman from Missouri, then we have made a tremendous mistake in our revenue bill that we did not put on an excess profits tax that would have raised nearly all the revenue needed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that, too. But the Utah Copper Co. made a report to its stockholders that they could put copper on board cars at 5½ cents a pound, and Mr. Baruch thinks we have brought it down to 16 cents. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. But without Mr. Baruch we would have been paying 30-odd cents a pound.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask you another question, then: Why does not the Attorney General of the United States hop onto those fellows that put it up to 30 cents? I am willing to give Baruch credit for pulling it down from 30 cents to 16 cents, but he did not pull it down far enough, and the Attorney General could put every one of those fellows into jail between now and Saturday night who kept the price up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] has expired.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I would like an extension.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No. If the gentleman will yield——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] has expired.

Mr. LUNN. Will you give me one minute?

Mr. MANN. The time was limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is limited.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes out of order to make a statement and to have a short letter read.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, nearly all the statements that have been made are clearly outside of the bill we have been here considering. I shall object to the reading of any remarks or the reading of any paper that does not relate to the matter we are considering.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I believe I had five minutes on that list.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us first settle this other proposition. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] wanted time.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I believe I was on the list for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will be recognized later.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on May 18, while we were considering the Howard amendment to raise revenue on distilled spirits, I made reference to a letter I had received from Mr. Gilmore, of Louisville, Ky., president of the National Model License League, in which he stated in that letter that he thought the American boys ought to be filled up with whisky before they went to the front to make a charge on the German trenches. Mr. Gilmore has written me since then, stating that I had misrepresented what he said, and he has requested me to have read from the Clerk's desk and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the letter I received from him April 21, 1917, and in justice to Mr. Gilmore I ask that his letter be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL MODEL LICENSE LEAGUE,
Louisville, Ky., April 21, 1917.

Hon. JOHN G. COOPER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: Among "war-time" measures brought before you will come the question of either restricting or attempting to prohibit the use of liquors. The inclosed article from the London Illustrated News offers suggestions that may appeal to you.

I believe that the soldier will need wine, beer, and whisky in and out of the trenches in moderation.

I believe that a good drink to each soldier before a charge will insure that steadiness of nerve that wins battles.

The man who rushes a rapid-fire gun should be given the relief from terror that alcohol imparts.

Our information shows that wine, beer, whisky, and brandy are all tremendous factors on both sides of both fronts in the great European war of to-day. And yet Mr. Bryan and his associates are asking that these beverages be denied the soldiers and that the vast properties of the liquor trade be destroyed without compensation.

Yours, very truly,

T. M. GILMORE.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, when I made the statement here I did not have Mr. Gilmore's letter with me; but I have looked it over since that time carefully, and I feel that I have no apologies to offer, for it seemed to me the very words of Mr. Gilmore's letter sustains the statement that I made. [Applause.] And I say that it little becomes any man to cast reflections on the bravery of the American boys. It ill becomes any man to say that Pershing and his brave troops who are about to go to France and to go to the battle front are cowards unless their minds are befuddled with whisky. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] is recognized.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I want to state particularly for the benefit of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], in charge of the bill, that when I spoke I did not speak in order to injure but to help strengthen the bill. The gentleman referred to the fact that I was connected with the State legislature at home. I want to tell the gentleman that I suppose I will outlive that in the course of time. [Laughter.] For 16 or 18 years I labored to take the death penalty off our statutes, but if the gentleman will stick the death penalty into this bill to punish the food conspirators I will vote for it. [Applause.]

Now, I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee. In two places of this bill, page 3 and page 4, you put in a penalty clause for the section, and I would ask the gentleman to amend that and make it for the act. If you will look at the bill on page 3, on line 10, you will notice that you provide for fees of witnesses who are summoned in the matter of the section. I would ask you to make that apply to the act.

Mr. LEVER. Let me ask the gentleman, if he will permit me, to go through the act with him for a moment and ask him which section provides the penalty. Section 4 provides that the Secretary shall requisition food. Do you apply a penalty to that?

Mr. JUUL. No. I am not speaking of the penalty, and if the gentleman will indulge me for just a moment——

Mr. LEVER. Then section 5 provides that the Secretary is authorized to cooperate with the States.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman is too far away from me.

Mr. LEVER. Has the gentleman a penalty for that?

Mr. JUUL. No. You are too far away. If you will wait I will read it to you. I am reading from page 3, line 10. There you provide for witness fees for witnesses summoned in relation to violations of this section. Now, you want to pay your witnesses if they were summoned on some other section. If you will turn over the bill you will find that you need witnesses on page 4, lines 5, 6, 7, and 8. According to your bill, on page 3, you can only pay your witnesses if you have summoned them in defense of the section. I am not seeking to criticize the bill. I am simply talking in the hope of strengthening it. That is all.

Mr. LEVER. I appreciate that; but I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that as to the section to which he called attention, section 4, the witnesses would be paid under existing law.

Mr. JUUL. You are just receiving authority to pay them when they are summoned for violation of the section, and you ought to make that apply to the act.

And then you have here, on page 4, "such person shall be paid for such seeds on delivery," and so forth. If they feel themselves aggrieved they sue. If they sue you will need witnesses, and the witnesses you have summoned on the preceding page would not be paid under your own bill. I am just trying to tell you that.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. In any suit brought under the section referred to, the Government would subpœna its witnesses under the general law, and, of course, under the general law it would pay the ordinary witness fees prescribed by the general law.

Mr. JUUL. I beg to differ with the gentleman. I think under this bill you would not so pay them. The language is, "witnesses summoned in pursuance of this section," not in pursuance of this act.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Government makes no provision for the payment of witnesses fees where the question relates to purely investigational matters.

Mr. JUUL. Does not the gentleman think that striking out the word "section" and inserting the word "act" would strengthen the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not.

Mr. JUUL. There is where the gentleman and I differ.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Iowa is not on the list.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, is my name on the list?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's name is not on the list; but if those whose names are on the list do not wish to speak, the Chair will recognize gentlemen who do wish to speak.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not quite agree with my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that section 1 of this bill is wholly without value. I think it is quite likely that the general sections of the bill could be sustained without reference to the war power. Section 3, for instance, might be sustained under the clause of the Constitution which authorizes the taking of a census. But, certainly, there can be no harm in placing the power for the enactment of the sections of this bill squarely upon the war clauses of the Constitution. Section 1 is purely declaratory. It does not contain any matter of legislation, and it is simply designed to constitute a declaration on the part of Congress of the essentiality of the information to be obtained under section 3 to the successful conduct of the war the view of the solicitor of the department being that Congress, having made declaration of the essentiality of this information for the conduct of the war, the court, if not precluded, would be very reluctant to overturn the declaration of Congress and to hold that the information was not essential to the conduct of the war. That is its only purpose. It does not regulate anybody; it does not purport to regulate anybody; and it does strengthen the bill to the extent that it makes the declaration of Congress that these things are essential to the conduct of the war.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, is the time exhausted, except for the closing statement?

The CHAIRMAN. There are 10 minutes left.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I believe I was on the list, was I not?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's name is not on the list, but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the gentleman from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, are on the list.

If they do not want to speak the Chair will be glad to recognize the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. I should be glad to have three minutes and would be glad to have the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] have the remainder of the five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to use the time, if somebody will explain why it is necessary to appropriate the amount of money that is called for in this bill and what the Government or the people of the United States will get for it.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that the appropriating sections of this bill are carried on the last two pages, and when we reach that clause I shall undertake to give the gentleman that information; but I think it is inappropriate to discuss that phase of it until we reach it. I shall be very glad to do my best to give the gentleman the information.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will it be satisfactory to the gentleman from South Carolina if I use a portion of the time that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] did not care to use?

Mr. LEVER. It will be entirely satisfactory to me; but that is a matter for the Chair.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not entitled to recognition, because I have already spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was going to say that it makes no difference to him, but the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] wish to speak.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think I applied first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa did apply first. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I shall not consume the five minutes. One reason that has been given for the passage of this bill and similar bills has been the action of Mr. Baruch in purchasing the copper which was referred to in the remarks of the gentleman from New York. This has been spoken of as a great achievement on the part of Mr. Baruch. The fact is that Mr. Baruch was not at all responsible, and is not entitled to any credit for the reduced price at which this copper was obtained. The copper was offered to the Government by the Copper Trust voluntarily, but, as I think, with a very definite purpose in mind when the offer was made. In the first place, it is only a one-fiftieth part of the production of copper, a very small part. The House will remember that at a previous session there was a tax placed upon copper in the revenue bill which was brought in, but that it went over to the other branch of the legislative department, and when it came back there was no tax left upon copper. In my judgment there ought to have been a tax placed upon copper, a tax upon the gross receipts of the copper companies, and they should have been included among the industries which were so taxed, on account of the enormous profits which they have been making. If this is the achievement which Mr. Baruch is to have to his credit—this and his connection with the leak investigation—there is nothing about it that will justify the passage of this bill and the extraordinary powers that are to be conferred on some parties with reference to the purchase of supplies and foods.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not a fact that Mr. Baruch was a heavy contributor in the last campaign? The gentleman does not want to rob him of all credit for that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I so understand. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am willing that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] should have the balance of the time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is entitled to first recognition.

Mr. HARDY. I want just about two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] for the three minutes which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] did not use.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill of serious import to our country, with a purpose far-reaching and intended to serve the welfare of America. It does seem to me that we should devote our time to the discussion of the bill, and not to the reading of wild editorials or communications from newspapers. If we do that, we can take days and weeks in doing what the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania] did a moment ago—in reading a hodgepodge, in order to find a peg on which to hang a criticism of the Government—and get nowhere on this bill.

The great question is whether the Agricultural Department or the Government shall have some authority to come to the relief of agricultural communities when their seed grows scarce, or for other reasons they need assistance in order to increase the supply of the great foodstuffs which we need so badly for ourselves and the allies. It is a serious matter, and I only wish to express the hope that the arguments and addresses will be confined to the bill, that patriotism may take the place of carping, and some breadth of intelligence may replace petty narrowness. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has taken up the time of the House in discussing what he calls the failure of the administration to prosecute trusts, and he said that we had prosecuted no trusts. We have instituted 42 cases against trusts, and some of them are in the gentleman's own State.

But what I rose to speak about was the portion of the gentleman's remarks about the allied forces making a glove for this country to wear. Gentlemen of the committee, are we American citizens? Are we loyal to the constituted authority of this Government? Do we have unity of purpose at this hour in the war in which we have engaged? Are we to follow loyally the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy? Some of you gentlemen do not talk like it; you do not speak as loyal citizens, according to my way of thinking. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], when he speaks lightly of our allies as he does, is giving comfort to our enemy. Gentlemen, the time has passed for that kind of talk. We are in war with Germany, and we are in it to the end. This Congress has declared that we have gone into it with our men and our money, and no man has the right to get up here and speak in a sneering way about our allies and to say that we are wearing a glove that they have made for us. I repudiate the statement as un-American. [Applause.] And gentlemen, I serve notice on you now that I am going to enter my protest against such talk every time I hear it, and I do not care whether the man making it is a Republican or a Democrat. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, a little consideration of the motion made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to strike out section 1 of this bill convinces me that the motion ought not to be agreed to. I am not sure that the section adds very largely to the bill, but it certainly can do no harm to retain it in the bill. Certain sections of this bill may have to rest after all on the war power of Congress. I think, therefore, that it would be unsafe or unwise to strike out the provision which may have an element of good and safety in it, and at the same time can not have in it any element of harm. Therefore I think it wise to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota and permit the section to remain in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not the paragraph wide enough and broad enough in its scope to admit of the appointment of a food dictator, so called, or some other person outside of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is speaking about section 2 and I am talking about section 1.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I allude to the first paragraph of the bill.

Mr. LEVER. No; that section does not do anything except to confer the powers hereinafter mentioned in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is right; it is in section 2 the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized "to take such measures," and so forth.

Mr. LEVER. We have not reached that yet, and we will dispose of it when we come to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 4 and 5, after the word "war," strike out the words "with Germany" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in which the United States is now engaged."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think that amendment ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto is closed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not it be better to use the term "Imperial Government of Germany," which was the expression used by the President of the United States?

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out after the word "Germany," in line 5, page 1, all of the language down to and including the word "Provided," in line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "Germany," strike out all down to and including the word "Provided," in line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAYBURN) there were—ayes 19, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "Germany" and insert the words "the Imperial Government of Germany."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to take such measures, to use such means, and to employ such existing or additional agencies of the Department of Agriculture as he finds necessary to stimulate the production, to promote the conservation and utilization, and to facilitate the distribution of foods and feeds.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 2, page 2.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to perfect the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the words "to take such measures, to use such means, and."

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to couple a slight addition to that, and I do not think there will be any objection to it. In addition to striking out the words suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, will the gentleman object to striking out in the next line the words "or additional agencies" and insert in lieu thereof "agents and employees"?

Mr. LEVER. Let the gentleman offer that later.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The motion I had made and was asking recognition for was identical with that offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], except, in addition, I desired to strike out the words "or additional agencies" and insert "agents and employees." Is it proper for me to offer that as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MANN. It is not a substitute.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is, with the addition of the words I move to strike out.

Mr. LENROOT. That is an additional amendment. It would require a separate vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of perfecting the paragraph, I offer the additional amendment to strike out, in line 3, page 2, the words "or additional agencies" and insert in lieu thereof "agents and employees."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out the words "or additional agencies" and insert in lieu thereof the words "agents and employees."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in support of the amendment. I shall not take five minutes. The only change that this amendment of mine will make is to strike out the words "or additional agencies." I do not know just what that language means. It is vague and indefinite. It may mean the employment of additional employees, a power which I think the Secretary should have, and I have suggested the change in the language so that the Secretary may be authorized to employ agencies now in his department and any new employees he may engage.

I desire, in addition to that, to say just a word in reference to this matter of the price of copper, which the Government will pay in the months immediately before us. I know something about the cost of producing copper, and I happen to have some personal knowledge of the way in which the offer was made to the Government by which the Government will receive the copper, upward of 50,000,000 pounds, for about 16 cents a pound. I want to state fairly and squarely and emphatically that Mr. Bernard Baruch had nothing whatever on earth to do with it. He is entitled to no more credit for it than the man in the moon. The offer on the part of the copper company to supply this copper to the Government for 16 cents or thereabouts was really a voluntary one on the part of the big producers of copper. Many of the big producers of copper have enjoyed enormous profits during the period of this war. There is not a shadow of doubt about that. They have enjoyed profits that exceeded anything they had ever dreamed of. Not very long ago copper was selling for 10 and 11 and 12 cents a pound, although in 1907 it is true that it went up to 25 or 26 cents a pound. These men who have made enormous profits in copper, realizing the exigencies of the situation, did have patriotism enough in their hearts to make this voluntary offer to the Government, and they should receive such credit as is their due.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. KING. Did not Mr. Baruch call their attention to that fact?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Baruch did, but long after they had volunteered it in the beginning. As to 5½ cents a pound being the cost of producing copper in Utah by the Utah Copper Co., that is probably true. The Utah Copper Co., I am informed, can produce copper more cheaply than it can be produced by any other company or men in the world—vastly cheaper. I think the testimony usually has been that it costs on an average somewhere around 13 or 14 cents a pound to produce copper, but the price that the Utah Copper Co. can produce it for I have always heard was around 7 or 8 cents. It is altogether likely that they have been able to produce it more cheaply by perfecting their system.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman know whether they have sold the copper they have produced so cheaply to the consumer any cheaper than the rest of the copper is sold for?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not know, but I presume not. They have been getting all the traffic will bear, I presume, the same as everyone else.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is the gentleman convinced that the Government has accepted this price for copper? Is it not a matter of fact that the acceptance of that has not yet been terminated?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not speaking of the completion of the contract. I am speaking of the offer.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Government has not accepted that price.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not advised whether it has or not.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have just been listening to a statement made by Mr. Baruch and a number of other people, speaking of the functions of the Council of National Defense, and I think I can say—it will be printed a little later on—that the matter of copper was spoken of, and, among other things this, that an offer came from the copper people on their own motion, and they were very highly commended by Mr. Baruch in his statement for their liberality and patriotism in selling it—I think, one-third cheaper than the market price.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thank the gentleman for this confirmatory statement.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion some of the language to which attention has been called in the preamble of the bill and section 2 of the bill should be stricken out altogether, because it relates to matters that are not in the bill—that the bill does not deal with at all. Nothing has been said here to inform those present that the bill when it was prepared originally contained another section which provided that it should be unlawful for any person to commit preventable waste of food, to monopolize food, or to enter into a contract, arrangement, or conspiracy to restrict the supply, enhance the price, or exact excessive prices for necessaries; unlawful to engage in discriminatory or deceptive practice in handling or dealing in necessaries, and unlawful to restrict equitable distribution of food necessaries. That section was stricken from the bill by the Committee on Agriculture because it was radically different from other sections of the bill and was dealing with matters entirely foreign to the purpose of the rest of the bill. It was thought necessary to deal with those matters in another way and at another time. These matters I speak of—section 2 of this bill and some of the words in the preamble—were in the bill at the time the section eliminated was also in it, and they related more or less to the section that was stricken out. You will see that it was reasonable for us to confer authority upon the President to take such measures and use such means and to employ agencies, and so on, to carry out the purpose of the bill as it was originally drawn; that is, when it contained the section that was stricken out which was intended to promote conservation and utilization of food and to facilitate distribution, and so on.

The section 2 remaining in the bill we are now considering—the words which I now wish to eliminate—related to what is contained in that section that was stricken out. But that section having gone out, these matters—that is, section 2 of this bill and other words referred to—have no place in the bill. They would confer broad authority upon the Secretary of Agriculture, authority that it seems to me ought not to be conferred in this bill or in any bill unless there be directions and limitation as to the extent of authority and the manner of using the authority.

The portion of the bill to which I object says:

> The Secretary is authorized to take such measures and use such means and employ such existing or additional agencies of the Government as he may find necessary.

Not to carry out any of the authority conferred upon him in the rest of the bill, not to enable him to enforce any of those provisions that are left in the bill, but to do other things that were treated of in the section that was stricken out.

Now, in my judgment, that section 2 has no place here, because it would give blanket authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to do a thousand and one things, altogether outside of this bill, with no restrictions or limitations upon his authority—give him absolute, supreme authority along lines and concerning matters of which this bill does not treat at all.

Now, this section 2, to which I object, stricken from the bill by the action of the committee because it was so different from anything else in the bill, because it would cause discussion and unnecessary delay in the passage of this very necessary bill, but containing very important features, is exactly, as I remember, or substantially, the same as section 4 of the bill H. R. 4630, which is still before the Committee on Agriculture.

Section 4 of H. R. 4630 contains the features that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has spoken of in regard to monopolizing, unfair and deceptive practices of handling, and conspiracies and gambling and improper fixing of prices of food products. Of course, those matters ought to be taken care of. They will be taken care of in time, but this is not the proper place for the consideration of them. In my judgment the Chair properly ruled the amendment of the gentleman out of order.

Now, in my opinion section 2 as it now stands in the bill before us relates and can only be based upon or hang upon the old section that was stricken from the bill; the presence of the old section, now eliminated, was the only ground for or excuse for the section and the language of which I am now speaking. In my judgment this section ought to go out altogether, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], while it helps in some respects, does not cure all the difficulties. The section, even with the amendment proposed by Mr. LENROOT, would give broad authority to the Secretary that we have no idea of conferring upon him in this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] has made a very clear and admirable statement. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] will consent to strike out section 2. I voted with him to keep in section 1. I do not know that it is necessary. I thought it might be. Section 2 has nothing to do with any other portion of the bill. I would not object myself to leaving section 2 in the bill if there was not to be additional legislation. Assuming that the Committee on Agriculture and the House believe that this power should be granted at all, it should be granted in the other bill which is now pending; and to insert this section in this bill and then pass H. R. 4380 will be to simply muddy the waters and complicate matters so that no one can tell under which law he is pursuing authority. That is not desirable. While the amendments agreed to have apparently cut down the matter some, there is no occasion for stating in this bill that the Secretary of Agriculture can do anything he pleases to stimulate production, to promote conservation and utilization, and to facilitate the distribution of foods and feeds. If you give that power to the Secretary of Agriculture and stop that, he will have all the powers from the foods and feeds provision which is carried in the bill H. R. 4380. All he would need then is money.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I have consulted with the members of the committee around me, and I feel that this section is more or less declaratory than otherwise, and in order to accommodate the gentleman and to save time we will agree to strike the section out. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. It seems to me, as a matter of precaution, it might be well enough to strike out of section 2 all after the word "to," in line 4, and then to add, just to carry it out:

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to take such measures and use such means to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. MANN. That language is quite essential at times when you are making appropriations and is frequently carried in appropriation bills, but all the provisions in this bill give the Secretary of Agriculture that authority specifically, and it is not necessary to carry it in this section.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. In section 5 it is specific.

Mr. MANN. All the other sections give authority.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that this turn has been taken, and that the gentlemen of the committee have agreed to the striking out of this section, but I do not agree with the reason for striking it out, of course, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] gave, namely, that it would come up in another bill. Of course, if it should come up in another bill and it were not stricken out, I would vote against the bill. I wonder if gentlemen of this House, when they read section 2 of this bill, realize the vast power that they are putting into the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture or somebody that he may appoint to act under him? And it is not for the reason that it may be covered in any other bill that I am glad it was stricken out, but it is because I am against that policy.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to perfect this section.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be authorized to renumber the sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] to strike out section 2.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I make the request that the Clerk renumber the sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the Clerk may renumber the sections. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will say, let the Clerk read through section 3 and then we will adjourn. We will not discuss it at all, but I just want the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foods, food materials, feeds, seeds, fertilizers, agricultural implements and machinery, and any article required in connection with the production, distribution, or utilization of food. For the purposes of this section the Secretary of Agriculture, and his agents duly authorized therefor, may compel the attendance at any designated place of witnesses from any part of the United States, the giving of testimony, oral or in writing, under oath or otherwise, the production of books, letters, papers, or documents, and the submission of reports; may sign, issue, and serve subpœnas; and may enter, on any business day during the usual hours of business, any place, including any structure, vessel, vehicle, or other premises except a dwelling house actually occupied exclusively as such. Any person who, in violation of any requirement made pursuant to this section, willfully fails or refuses to obey any subpœna, to answer any question, or to submit any book, letter, paper, document, or report, or knowingly makes any false or misleading answer or report, or willfully conceals or withholds any information, or any person who willfully obstructs or hinders the Secretary of Agriculture or any of his duly authorized agents in the performance of any duty under this section, upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both. Witnesses summoned in pursuance of this section shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there are a number of amendments to be offered to this section. I suggest that gentlemen offer them now, and that they be printed in the RECORD, so that they can see them to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Let them be printed in the RECORD for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the suggestion of the gentleman that they be reported at the desk?

Mr. LEVER. No; merely that they be printed in the RECORD for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that any person desiring to offer amendments can hand them to the Clerk and they be printed in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word of explanation in offering these amendments, because I may not have opportunity in the morning. Two of these amendments relate to the correction of the power that is given to the Secretary of Agriculture to subpœna witnesses from any part of the United States to any place that he may designate. The two amendments are essential to correct that. One strikes out certain lines and inserts certain words giving the power to subpœna witnesses, and the other provides that no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be required to attend outside of the district court of the United States within which such witness resides. The third amendment relates to entering any place during the hours of a day, limiting it to places in which the products enumerated in this section are stored or held. I offer these amendments to section 2 as it will be renumbered.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, they will be printed in the RECORD.

Following are the amendments submitted for printing in the RECORD:

Amendments offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania:

Page 2, line 16: After the word "therefor," in line 16, strike out the remainder of line 16, all of line 17, and the word "States," in line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "may compel the attendance of witnesses, and."

Page 2, lines 23 and 24: Strike out all after "premises," in line 23, and all of line 24 except the word "Any," and after the said word "premises," on line 23, insert "in which products enumerated in this section are stored or held."

Page 3, line 12, after the word "States," insert: "Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend outside of the judicial district of the district court of the United States wherein such witness resides."

Amendment offered by Mr. CURRY of California: Page 2, line 9, after the word "the," strike out "basic."

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS: Amend the bill by striking out from and including line 7, page 2 of the bill, to and including the word "section," in line 1, page 3, strike out the comma, add a period, and insert:

"The Secretary of Agriculture and his agents duly authorized therefor may issue and serve subpœnas and compel the attendance of witnesses at any designated place in the county of their respective residences or where they may be at the time of service of subpœnas; the giving of testimony, oral or in writing, under oath or otherwise; the production of books, letters, papers, or documents, and the submission of reports; and may enter any office, place of business, or place where located other than those of the producers, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts with regard to the ownerships, present and past, past and contemplated time of storage, or of withholding from consumption, quantity, quality, condition, purposes for which held, price paid, and at which held, cost and expenses of carriage, profits and losses, and all other transactions and facts of or with regard to foods, food material, and farm products which would be serviceable in preventing food waste, uneconomic storing, transportation or distribution, unnecessary or extortionate profits, or price manipulations, or which would be serviceable to the Government, request therefor having been made by the Department of Justice, in the investigation of or prosecution for any violation of the laws of the United States, with regard to such products. Whoever"

Amendment offered by Mr. EMERSON: At the end of section 3 insert:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to seize all wheat in the United States now held by any person, partnership, or corporation, except the farmer who raised the same, and to pay therefor the price paid the farmer for same plus all costs and expenses in caring for same and handling same since purchasing, plus 8 per cent; and sell same to the people of the United States.

"If any person, partnership, or corporation holding any such wheat refuses to accept the price ascertained herein, he may sue the United States in any court of the United States."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 25, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we call upon Thy name that we may not forget the great eternal verities of life. In the midst of the demands upon our time and attention, the vast problems that are before us, we would not forget the things that are in God's hands alone in the region of close questioning, where we deal with God only. We pray that Thou wilt give us grace, with deep humility, with reverent spirit, and with consecration to do the things that are pleasing in Thy sight, knowing that all things work together for good to them that love Thee. Guide us to this end this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FOOD GAMBLERS ROBBING PEOPLE—STOCK SOLD BECAUSE GRAIN IS SO HIGH—WILSON GETS LETTER WRITTEN BY FIELD AGENT FOR NATIONAL EMERGENCY FOOD GARDEN COMMISSION NOW ON TOUR OF INVESTIGATION TELLING HOW THE UNITED STATES IS FAST BEING DEPLETED OF CATTLE.

WASHINGTON, May —.

That it is time the Government took a hand in managing the food problem of the country is pointed out to-day by E. H. Kelley, field agent of the National Emergency Food Garden Commission, who reported to P. S. Ridsdale, the secretary, how the people are being held up and how the dairymen are selling their cattle because of the high prices of grain and because of the high prices they can get for the cattle on the hoof.

The letter, which bears out the charges made in the United States Senate that food gamblers are in control of the food supply of the country, was forwarded to President Wilson by Secretary Ridsdale.

Mr. Kelley, who is a graduate of New Hampshire State College, has been out for six weeks getting first-hand information as to the food situation in the country. At the direction of the National Emergency Food Garden Commission, of which Charles Lathrop Pack is president, Mr. Kelley has been organizing food-garden planting clubs and enlisting the aid of newspapers in the nation-wide campaign the commission has been conducting for more food gardens.

Mr. Kelley's amazing statements as to conditions as he finds them are told in a letter to Secretary Ridsdale from Rutland, Vt. The letter follows:

"The greatest question throughout New England at present seems to be one of labor rather than anything else. In almost every case where I have talked with farmers they say they could and would do more if they had the help. Many of the farmers are putting in smaller acreage simply because it is impossible, practically, to get help.

"Here in Vermont a very great problem is the matter of grain. To-day I was talking to a man who has a big dairy, and he said that he is going out of business because he is simply paying out of his own pocket to keep the thing going. He is one of many who are doing the same.

"This shortage of grain and the high price which they can get for their animals is simply depleting the country of its stock, but it is almost impossible to make the people see the folly of selling off the animals which are needed for reproduction.

"The matter of seeds has quite a little to do with the acreage planted. I am constantly asked the question as to how they can afford to plant with the price of seed so high. Quite a few dealers are taking advantage of the situation to bleed the farmers, and because of this the planting is being held up.

"For example, I know of one case where a large wholesale concern 'had no beans,' and yet I know absolutely that they had 400 bushels which they were holding for a higher price. They got the wrong end of it, though, because the community (———, N. H.) imported 200 bushels.

"Still another question is that of the food speculators. Here in ——— I found a store with 15,000 barrels of flour and selling just as little as possible to their customers. Within a day's ride of here I can find 37,000 barrels being held for a high price.

"I mention these facts merely to show you what I am running up against and the problems which I am trying to solve. Perhaps I am going into the matter too deeply, but it seems to me that I should do everything in my power to help the people in such a serious state of affairs as exists at present.

"Now, the question is, What shall I do? If anything is done at Washington to relieve these conditions I wish you would let me know about it, so that I may be able to put it into practice just as soon as possible. Everything that gives the people more confidence serves to increase the food production, and I think they should be given all the encouragement possible, especially by the Government, because it is urging them so strongly to do their bit. It certainly should back them up in what it advocates."

CONCORD, N. H., May 15, 1917.

HENRY F. HOLLIS, Esq.
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At the request of my shopmates, who wish to know the truth of the national food situation, I am going to tell or try to tell you how we feel about it. Of course, you understand our means of obtaining information consist of only what we can get from the "press," which, to say the least, is very confusing information. First they preach economy, then warn against parsimony; then Mr. Hoover, in big headlines, comes out and announces that prices can be cut 40 per cent with fair profit to everybody. If this statement is true, why does not the Government take steps to accomplish this most desirable end or give the statement the lie? How are workmen—of whom 90 per cent, according to the manufacturer's estimate, live within two weeks of starvation all the time—to draw any line between economy and parsimony?

We have obtained raises in pay but living cost has gained on us 3 cents to our 1 in wage advance, so we are relatively worse off. Railroad men are losing their right by new laws to right this condition with our only known weapon—strike—so we must perforce look to the Government, which has tied our hands, for relief. Is the Government taking any steps in this direction—lowered living cost? These compulsory clauses are thought amongst us to be an unnecessary and insulting reflection on our patriotism.

Can and will you help clear up this perplexing situation? If the food situation is as bad as painted we are willing to "do our bit, pay the cost, and help out if necessary." We want help.

This letter is not written in the spirit of criticism, but with the intent to help clear a situation which will bring into existence a spirit of criticism hard to quell later on, for if conservative old New Hampshire is sizzling beneath the surface on this question, other parts of the country must be almost to the boiling point.

Hoping this letter will be received in the spirit intended and considered fully, I am,

Yours, respectfully, ROBT. JORDAN.

[From the Evening Standard, May 7, 1917.]

FRUIT PROMISES WELL—LOUIS H. BUCKSHORN RETURNS TO THE CITY ON A VISIT—OPTIMISTIC ABOUT FOOD SUPPLY, HE SAYS GOVERNMENT SHOULD SET HIGH AND LOW PRICES—EVERY COMMUNITY SHOULD RAISE ITS OWN CORN.

Louis H. Buckshorn, of Westford, formerly of New Bedford, special appraiser of the Federal farm-loan bank at Springfield, was a visitor in New Bedford this morning. Mr. Buckshorn is a fruit grower. The fruit crops, he said, in New England are very promising.

"Peach and apple buds have come through the winter exceedingly well," he told the Standard to-day. "So did all other fruit—both small and large. There will be a large supply of good fresh fruits from one end of the season to the late fall.

"We have been overfrightened on the food question. While it is serious in view of the shortage of winter wheat and the tremendous demand of our allies this summer and fall, we should not grow hysterical.

"In New England every farmer can help to relieve the situation by growing his own potatoes, vegetables, oats, and flint corn—corn enough to feed his stock and corn meal for his family, and a little over for city folks. If he can increase his clover crop he can reduce the expensive mill feeds he now buys.

"I believe New England country districts can be made self-sustaining as to meat, grains, and family foods. This will take a serious drain from the general markets, and be an invaluable help.

"We have been tending toward more intelligent handling of the land during the last 10 years. There has been too much 'range' and not enough intensity. We have reached the place where we have found what is intelligently saved in getting our crops is a large part of the net gain.

"In the cities the manure sweepings from the streets should be carted to certain places in every district, and back-yard gardeners be allowed to have it. It should be free from tar and oil. Where the garden plots are very small winter supplies other than potatoes should be grown. Some beets, carrots, rutabagas, cabbage, parsnips. Fruit will be plentiful and fairly cheap and help out in the summer. Eat what you can, then can what you can't."

He was then asked about the Government control of food and prices. Mr. Buckshorn thought it would be necessary to fix a low price and high price for the standard grain, root, and apple crops of the country, the price to range between the set figures.

"This will work great good in many ways," he explained. "The farmer will then be out of the haphazard indefiniteness that doesn't know whether there will be a market or a price. It will give him a fair profit and a sure market. The Government and the farmer will be on the same business basis that Uncle Sam is when he needs and buys powder and guns. It will be the best kind of cooperative work.

"In addition, it will take the main supplies out of the reach of food gambling and extortionate prices.

"It will allay the present hysteria and food-stocking tendency. It will lift the dread that hangs over millions of homes to-day when they know that Uncle Sam has made ample food contracts at reasonable prices.

"The Federal authority that says so many pounds and so much size make a standard of measure has the power to enforce it. The same authority, especially in war times, will say as to range of price, and will have the power to enforce it.

"We may not like this strong centralization of government, but it is absolutely necessary. War and republican forms of government are only tolerable when it becomes necessary to fight for the preservation of liberty and its institutions. This is not a war for national greed and conquest, and the Government at Washington must be strong enough to prevent individual and corporate greed from choking off the supplies to the millions who are in this fight for democracy.

"The whole affair of war and food supply is not a holiday matter. But let us face it with an intelligent seriousness, not with hysteria. Stop publishing the despairing cartoons and let us have pictures of possible food supplies in good humor as well as in good fact. Rally the country-wide ministry at its unparalleled opportunity of teaching that the slacker in farming this year is worse than the slacker in the city guards, and the honor that comes to the farmer boy on the farm is an honor of the highest rank.

"His country needs him most and best where he is—and where he can do his most and his best—on the farm."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the secretary of the Rotary Club, of Miami, Fla.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIAMI, FLA., May 25, 1917.

Hon. PARK TRAMMELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

By unanimous resolution of Miami Rotary Club you are requested to urge the adoption of "Dixie" as the National war song of the United States.

GEO. A. MCKINNON, Secretary.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the Board of Trade of Tampa, Fla., and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAMPA, FLA., May 23, 1917.

Hon. PARK TRAMMELL,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

This organization has been requested by the Havana cigar manufacturers of Tampa to wire you a protest against the proposed additional duty of 10 per cent ad valorem on tobacco, claiming this will be a death blow to the industry. They have already been heavily taxed by the increase of internal revenue on cigars. They are willing that the specific duty now in effect be increased 10 per cent if necessary, but that the 10 per cent ad valorem in addition to the present duty would so cripple the industry that it would not only ruin their business but would defeat the aim of the committee of increasing revenue this way.

TAMPA BOARD OF TRADE.

SUPPLY OF FREIGHT CARS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have a letter from Mr. Newman Erb, a lawyer of quite broad experience in railroad matters, in which he discusses the importance of an increased supply of freight cars. I will not ask that it be read, but I do believe it contains valuable information, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 23, 1917.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the bill recently introduced by you for the purpose of affording much-needed relief of the critical freight-car situation, I desire to present to you some facts which may serve to hasten action in the matter.

The public is vitally concerned that the facilities of our railroads for service—prompt and efficient service—shall be adequate; that terminals, distributing points, assembling yards, and equipment shall keep pace with expansion and the added demands which every year has brought in the past and which every year hereafter is sure to bring; that they be able to measurably anticipate what may be reasonable to expect of them next year and the following year. Unfortunately, this has become impossible of accomplishment by a large majority in number and mileage of our railroads with inadequate net earnings, unsatisfactory because of the unreasonable return to their shareholders and the impairment of their credit to the vanishing point.

We were short 143,000 freight cars on April 1 last. This is the so-called "between-season" period. When crops begin to move, taken with our present industrial activity and the added burden upon our transportation system through war conditions, what is the shortage likely to be then? The situation is critical now; it is sure to become more so, and I hope I may arouse your interest and the interest of Congress in obtaining the cooperation of the Government to avoid the embarrassments, hardships, and suffering certain to result unless the emergency upon us is promptly dealt with. Full relief this year will be impossible, but partial relief may be given by very prompt action. The railroad companies have not the financial credit, and have not had it for a long time, to raise the necessary large sums of money to meet this pressing demand.

Our railroads have not kept pace with their normal equipment requirements. Since 1899, 73,636 locomotives were built for our railroads, yet only 63,850 locomotives were in service in 1915, with an actual decline over the year 1916. Of freight cars, 2,535,911 were built, and yet only 2,283,830 were in service at the end of 1916. Notwithstanding that 209,113 freight cars were built in 1915 and 1916, we had less cars in service in 1916 than in 1914. The large fortunes invested in locomotives and freight cars which were in existence 17 and 18 years ago have entirely disappeared.

For 1916, 829 railroads, independently operated, reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission, representing 254,179 miles. Of these, 697, or 82 per cent of the total in number, operated 136,350 miles, whose earnings were less than $10,000 per mile. These are the great arteries of commerce that act as feeders and distributers for the great trunk lines. They naturally come into closer and more intimate relations with the people in the territory which they respectively serve than their more important connections, and it is upon their development the South, Southwest, and the Northwest are now depending, and must for some considerable time still depend, for their commercial and industrial growth. Yet this group of railroads, with 136,350 miles of operated mileage, earned less than $10,000 per mile last year, considered the most prosperous in their history; paid dividends averaging 3.68 per cent of their capital, over half of which, or $52,747,552 out of a total of $101,497,122, was appropriated out of surplus. This indicates the desperate efforts made to sustain their declining credit. They can not be relied upon, because they have not the means to supply the much-needed equipment, and in the pressing emergency I believe all must agree that it is as vital to the country that our railroads shall be in a condition to perform the services which are now most essential if our war requirements at home and abroad are to be met, and that they should be assisted, as it is for us to furnish assistance in the reconstruction of the railroads of our allies.

The freight car equipment of the country has very properly been placed under a unified central control, but a large number of additional freight cars should be promptly added. This can be obtained only through Government agencies. The car companies of the country have for several years, and are now utilizing only a little more than 25 per cent of their normal capacity, but on account of the difficulty of obtaining the materials it is impossible, even if credit were available, to secure the material for the new cars in time for this year's service without recourse to the power of the Government to obtain preferential deliveries.

No greater service can be performed to the country, in my opinion, in the pressing circumstances than in assisting the railroads to finance a large addition to their equipment and to command preferential delivery of the materials for its construction.

I would therefore suggest that appropriate legislation be enacted creating a credit sufficient in amount to cover the cost 200,000 freight cars of standards approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, to be placed in interstate traffic under the direction of the American Car Service Association and the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The cost of the cars to be assumed by the railroad companies engaged in interstate traffic, and repaid with interest at 4 per cent per annum in 30 semiannual payments, a lien being reserved by the Government on the cars to secure such payment. The per diem earnings to be collected by the American Car Service Association, and applied:

1. To the cost of their proper maintenance.
2. The surplus to the repayment of the principal and interest.

Any deficits shall be apportioned and collected from the interstate carriers in proportion which their respective total annual freight car mileage bears to the aggregate total freight car mileage of all such carriers, and for which they shall be statutorily liable.

This involves no governmental burden. It places no appreciable burden upon the carriers, because if they do not get their proportionate use of these particular cars they receive the benefit of an enlarged use of other cars.

The per diems paid are now properly made chargeable to operating cost, the payments made for the cars in excess of the per diem collected for their use should also be made chargeable to operating cost.

We should have at least the 200,000 freight cars added to our equipment and completed during the present year. I believe the car companies, if provided with the material, are at present in a condition to furnish them this year.

Very respectfully, NEWMAN ERB.

GRAND CANYON OF THE COLORADO.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have an article here entitled "First through the Grand Canyon." It is a review of the exploration of that great wonder of the world. I desire to have it made a public document, and as it is a matter of some thirty pages, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing to determine whether it shall be printed as a public document.

The motion was agreed to.

FOOD SUPPLY.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of the Official Bulletin of May 17, 1917. My colleague [Mr. LEWIS] a few days ago took occasion to interpret and admonish certain public utterances that were made. I do not wish to follow in his footsteps, but in order that it may be properly elucidated for the information of the public on a subject that is leading to great precipitate action on the food question, I present in this copy of the Official Bulletin the parts which I have marked—one from the Attorney General saying there is no danger, that it is ridiculous to talk about the shortage of food supplies; and the other on the following page, that I have marked, from the Secretary of Commerce saying that we are in danger of ultimate starvation. I should like to have the Cabinet reconcile itself before it sends out statements to the public at this time that are calculated not only to cause a food panic but great confusion in attempting to escape from it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois make any request in connection with the matter referred to?

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator if he will not have it read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be glad, if not intruding on the time of the Senate, to have the marked passages read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Reading from the Official Bulletin, volume 1, No. 7:

WASHINGTON, Thursday, May 17, 1917.

From a statement by Attorney General Gregory:

"I am not an authority on the food situation of the country. That belongs properly to the Department of Agriculture; but I am led to believe, from the reports submitted to me, that there is much hysteria occasioned by reports of food shortage. It is ridiculous to think that there will be starvation or want in this country. There will be sufficient food.

'From my reports I conclude that many of the present high prices are the result of inadequate distribution facilities. If the President is given authority, as has been proposed to Congress, to direct freight shipments and give priority to certain classes of freight, I am confident that the situation will be materially improved."

Reading from page 3 of the same publication:

Secretary of Commerce Redfield addressed the National Association of Manufacturers in New York on Wednesday on the subject "How can manufacturers help?"

"MAY FACE FOOD SHORTAGE.

"It is a fact and no dream that we may face next winter a shortage of food for ourselves and our allies. Only a long and strong pull will prevent this becoming a dread reality. He is a patriot who cultivates an extra rod of land, and those of us who can make land available for cultivation and aid toward its working should at once take steps to bring that about. I am fond of roses, but potatoes are more needed now."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this same connection I desire to read a part of a letter received by me from the executive secretary of the American Forestry Association, dated May 15, 1917. The letter states as follows:

We want to give you a little more information about the work of the American Forestry Association and the National Emergency Food Garden Commission, about which we wrote you a short while ago.

At least $250,000,000 worth of foodstuffs will be raised this year as a result of our cooperation; over 22,000,000 people are reading the commission's daily garden lessons in fifteen hundred newspapers. Patriotic citizens are so anxious to "do their bit" that the movement, instituted by a few public-spirited men, is growing swiftly into a great, Nation-wide propaganda, which bids fair to so increase the food supply as to furnish a surplus for our allies' troops on the battle line.

I thought if one association in this country through its propaganda has increased the food production $250,000,000 worth this year there is no particular necessity of daily calling the attention of the people to the fact that the American people are in a starving condition.

Mr. REED. What is the association, may I inquire?

Mr. SMOOT. It is the American Forestry Association.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Illinois, in asking that certain extracts be read from the Official Bulletin, did not state what the bulletin is, and I think it is desirable to have appear in the RECORD what the publication is. Therefore I will ask the Secretary to read, on page 4, the matter that I have marked with a pencil.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Official Bulletin. Published every weekday by the Committee on Public Information.

Office: No. 10 Jackson Place, Washington, D. C.

Copies of the Official Bulletin will be furnished without charge to newspapers, all post offices in the United States, public officials, and agencies of a public or semipublic character equipped for the dissemination of official news of the United States Government.—E. S. Rochester, editor.

Subscription rates by mail: Daily, one year, $5; six months, $3.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

I hereby create a Committee on Public Information, to be composed of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and a civilian who shall be charged with the executive direction of the committee.

As civilian chairman of the committee I appoint Mr. George Creel.

The Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy are authorized each to detail an officer or officers to the work of the committee.

WOODROW WILSON.

APRIL 14, 1917.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] that the statements of the Attorney General and Secretary Redfield are in conflict with each other, I think it is perfectly proper to state that I fail to see the conflict. Mr. Gregory, speaking of the food shortage, stated that there would be no danger of a shortage of food so far as the American people are concerned. Secretary Redfield refers to both the United States and our allies. There is no doubt that we will be more or less short of food to supply both this country and our allies. I do not think from what I heard read that there is anything inconsistent in the two statements.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question. Does anyone know about the Official Bulletin? Under what authority is it published and how is the expense of it paid? Is there an appropriation made by Congress for the publication of that sort of an organ, or in what respect is it official? If anyone knows, I should like to have information. Of course, if no one knows, I can not get it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I do not know that I can give the Senator any information on the subject except the experience I have had in other countries. In Mexico, for example, Carranza has what he calls a Diario Oficial or Periodico Oficial.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Like the Moniteur?

Mr. FALL. It is the official periodical in which his decrees are published. We have had such close associations with the Carranza Government in recent years that it is possible this is one of the products of their system which we admire and which we are seeking to ingraft upon our establishments at this time.

NORTH CAROLINA STATE BONDS.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, last January there was a debate in the Senate in regard to an application about to be made by the Republic of Cuba for leave to bring suit in the United States Supreme Court against the State of North Carolina upon certain repudiated bonds of that State. Statements were made in the course of this debate to which it is desired to make an answer in the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. A large number of the present bondholders, aside from the Republic of Cuba, are citizens of the State of New York, and it therefore seems appropriate that the answer should be made through a Senator from that State.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement which will take about one-half page of the RECORD. I may add that I have shown it to the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and he will offer no objection.

There being no objection, the statement referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, May 4, 1917.

HON. WILLIAM M. CALDER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On November 6, 1916, the Republic of Cuba asked leave of the Supreme Court of the United States to bring suit against the State of North Carolina on a number of the special-tax bonds of North Carolina of the issues of 1868 and 1869, donated to it by citizens of New York State.

At the instance of North Carolina the motion was set down for argument on January 8 of this year. On January 2 the junior Senator from North Carolina, Mr. OVERMAN, introduced a resolution in the United States Senate the evident purpose of which was to procure the withdrawal of the motion by lending the matter an aspect fraught with international complications. Discussion of this resolution took place in the Senate on January 2 and 6 and resulted in the withdrawal of the motion in the Supreme Court.

The arguments presented in these discussions indicate that there is on the part of the leaders of public opinion in North Carolina a basic misconception of the attitude of the present holders of these bonds, and that a free exchange of views with an open mind on both sides might go far toward relieving a difficult situation.

The bondholders are loath to believe that North Carolina in repudiating these bonds wishes to avoid the payment of any just debts or morally valid claims against the State. They prefer to think that the differences which have existed and still exist between the holders of the bonds and the State have been brought about by a genuine misunderstanding of the situation, and that if the true equities are made to appear in a friendly discussion the result would be accepted by North Carolina, whatever it might be.

It must be assumed that the present bondholders, in endeavoring to enforce their rights, are doing so in an honest belief in the justice of their claim. This belief is founded upon the following facts:

1. It is a matter of record that from 1868 to 1870 these bonds were actively dealt in on the New York Stock Exchange, selling from 61 to as high as 89.

2. During this period thousands of dollars worth of these bonds were purchased in the open market by bona fide investors, who lent their money in the belief that it would be used in rehabilitating the State of North Carolina.

3. Among the purchasers at the time mentioned were members of various prominent banking firms, and the bonds then purchased by them are now owned by their heirs. This is also true of many of the smaller holders.

4. While a number of the original holders, or their estates, doubtless have been forced to sell their holdings from time to time for such prices as they could get, for the purpose of settling estates and otherwise, the purchasers of such bonds were surely within their rights in buying and took as good a title as their vendors had.

5. It is not the fact, and we believe that it has never even been suggested, that the original purchasers of these bonds in the North or the present holders were ever in collusion with the public officials of North Carolina who originally issued the bonds, and through whose dishonesty the State suffered so greatly.

From these facts, and from the further facts so ably presented by the junior Senator from North Carolina in the Senate, it follows that there are three parties or groups of parties in interest of varying degrees of responsibility and of actual or apparent good faith, as follows:

(a) The State of North Carolina, which appears to have had governmental conditions forced upon her by which her name and credit were used as instruments of fraud.

(b) The Federal Government, which, by the reconstruction legislation of Congress and the executive appointments made during the reconstruction period, brought about the conditions that made the fraud possible.

(c) The original bona fide purchasers of the bonds, and their heirs and assigns, who were defrauded out of their investments made in good faith upon the credit of the State of North Carolina.

In equity and good conscience there is no fair ground for censuring or criticizing the bondholders for endeavoring to recover the investments which they made in good faith upon promises to pay signed by the apparently responsible officials of North Carolina and sealed with the great seal of the State. If the State should not now be held to account, for the reasons which its junior Senator presented before the Senate, and the further reasons stated in the minority report of the committee of the Senate of 1871, then the United States Government should make some provision for the payment of those bonds, and the bondholders should not be forced to suffer a total loss or be attacked for claiming their rightful and lawful dues.

From the minority report it appears that about $1,000,000 out of the proceeds of these special-tax bonds were actually expended upon the construction of the railroads for whose benefit the bonds were issued. Surely, neither the State of North Carolina nor its statesmen would wish it to be understood that although the State received at least this amount of benefit, it nevertheless declines to repay this sum with interest to date. In all fairness, responsibility for this amount, at least, should be assumed by North Carolina and apportioned as well as may be among the outstanding bonds, the proceeds of which it represents, and the State of North Carolina should cooperate with the holders of the bonds in an effort to have the United States Government make some fair provision for the balance.

In this connection it is appropriate to quote the language of the Supreme Court of North Carolina itself with reference to a claim upon similar bonds (Balzer v. State, 104 N. C., 265 at 277):

"We think we ought to add that if the facts are, as they appear strongly in the pleadings, indeed such the plaintiff's claim as against some party is one of real merit. They supplied the iron now on the railroad of the railroad company mentioned, and it seems that they have been paid but a small part of the large sum of money it cost them. We do not mean to intimate that the State is liable legally or otherwise for their debt, but surely some party ought to pay."

The great majority of the present holders of the bonds are the heirs and immediate successors of the original bona fide purchasers and are not, in any sense, speculators. They wish to deal fairly with North Carolina, and they recognize that the State suffered deeply through the dishonesty of some and the incompetence of others of the State officials during the dark days of reconstruction, but they feel that they are themselves entitled to fair treatment and that this invitation from them to the counselors and representatives of the State of North Carolina to a fair, friendly, and free discussion of the whole situation should be met in the spirit in which it is tendered.

Yours, faithfully,

HOWARD THAYER KINGSBURY,
MARCUS H. BURNSTINE,
Attorneys for Bondholders.

STATEMENT OF GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I present and desire to have printed in the RECORD a statement made by the Italian poet, Gabriele D'Annunzio, which, however, is in prose. I think it is particularly appropriate on account of the recent arrival in this country of the Italian commissioners. I hope there will be no objection to its being printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California? The Chair hears none.

The address referred to is as follows:

ITALIAN POET, IN THRILLING WORDS, CALLS AMERICA TO FIGHT FOR IDEAL—WAR CREATIVE, NOT DESTRUCTIVE, WRITES GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO—SUMMONS THE PEOPLE OF LINCOLN TO DEFEND THE ETERNAL SPIRIT OF MAN AGAINST THE FURY OF THE BARBARIAN.

[By Gabriele D'Annunzio.]

ROME, April 7.

For the soul of Italy to-day the Capitol at Washington has become a beacon light. A Roman garland wreathes the bust dedicated to the hero whom free men call the glorious knight of humanity. It is a garland pure as the branch of lilac offered by a poet on the bier of Lincoln. It is as sacred as the ever-flowering bough "with heart-shaped leaves of rich green." It seems as though in this April of passion and tempest there reechoes the cry of that April, tense with joy and anguish, "O captain! My captain, rise up! Hear the bells. Rise up, for your flag is flung."

Now, the group of stars on the banner of the great Republic has become a constellation of the spring, like the Pleiades; a propitious sign to sailors, armed and unarmed alike; a spiritual token for all nations fighting a righteous war. I give the salute of Italy, of the Roman capitol to the Capitol at Washington; a salute to the people of the Union who now confirm and seal the pledge that liberty shall be preserved.

FIGHTING FOR AN IDEAL.

To Italy alone of the allied nations the possibility was open of avoiding war and remaining a passive spectator. Italy took up arms gladly, less for the reconquest of her heritage than for the salvation of all the things which symbolize the grandeur of freedom. She armed herself as to-day the American Nation is arming herself, for the sake of an ideal. The spontaneous act consummated by the people of Washington is a glorious sacrifice on behalf of the hopes of all mankind.

America has achieved a new birth. She has molded for herself a new heart. This is the miracle wrought by a righteous war, the miracle that unexpectedly to-day we of Italy see performed beyond an ocean dishonored by assassins and thieves.

Our war is not destructive. It is creative. With all manner of atrocities, all manner of shameful acts, the barbarian has striven to destroy the idea which, until this struggle began, man had of man. The barbarian multiplied on the innocent infamous outrages inspired by hate, alternating senile imprudence and brutal stupidity. The barbarian ground heroism to earth, cast down the airy cathedrals where congregated the aspirations of the eternal soul, burned the seats of wisdom decked with the flowers of all the arts, distorted the lineaments of Christ, tore off the garments of the virgin.

Now once again we begin to have hope of the nobility of man. Love's face is radiant, though its eyes are moist with tears, for never was love so much beloved. Love overflows on all the world like a brook in May. Our hearts are not large enough to gather it and to hold it. The people of Lincoln springing to their feet to defend the eternal spirit of man, to-day increase immeasurably this sum of love opposed to fury, the fury of the barbarian.

QUOTES LINCOLN'S WORDS.

"Ah liberty! Let others despair of thee. I will never despair of thee," once cried your rugged poet. In this hope your Nation arises to-day, in the North, South, East, West, to offer your strength, proclaiming our cause to be the noblest cause for which men have ever fought. You were an enormous and obtuse mass of riches and power; now you are transfigured into ardent, active spirituality. The roll of your drums drowns out the last wail of cowardice.

April 15 is the anniversary of Lincoln's death. From his sepulcher there issue again the noble words which fell from his lips at Gettysburg, on soil sanctified by the blood of brave men. All your States, North, South, East, West, hear them, I say to you that "This Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom."

ADDRESS OF THE RIGHT HON. ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD the address by the Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour delivered before the National Press Club in this city on May 24, 1917.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Nevada has made the request. I hope it will be granted and I hope the address will be read. There has been so much unjust and unwarranted criticism of Congress because of the statement that Congress has been slow in enacting legislation that I think this statement of Mr. Balfour is particularly appropriate. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has given out a statement showing in detail the remarkable legislative achievements of this Congress during the 36 days we have been in session, and I should like the country to know, and I hope the newspaper men will publish the fact that this foreign delegate to the United States stands amazed at the remarkable work of constructive and unusual legislation that has been accomplished in Congress during 36 days. I think this address comes with particular grace from Mr. Balfour, and I should like to have the newspapers of the country be a little more just to Congress and not be always cavilling and criticizing because of the alleged slowness with which Congress has been proceeding. As Mr. Balfour says, there is no record in history of a democratic form of government, which is necessarily compelled to move with deliberation and consideration, of such remarkable legislation having been accomplished in such a short space of time.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] will allow me in this connection, may I call attention to a very brief statement made by an officer of the French Government who was here as the representative of finance, remarking that he was interested—a rather guarded expression—in the criticism from certain sources of Congress as being slow in passing a $2,000,000,000 appropriation, and adding that in his country it would have been remarkable if the people would have allowed a $2,000,000 appropriation to have been passed within that length of time?

May I call to the attention of the Senate that this officer of the French Government, representing the highest head of finance, marveled at a $2,000,000,000 undertaking being passed in that length of time; and referred to it not only as being expeditious, but as unusual, and stating that such a thing would have startled France?

I add these two observations to what has been said by the eminent Senator from Nebraska touching the views expressed by Mr. Balfour, of England.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to change my figures as to the length of the session from "36 days" to "45 days"; but the achievements remain equally remarkable.

I speak with some warmth on this subject because I have seen in the press, particularly of the eastern cities, a disposition to be unreasonable; to hammer and to crowd Congress in the consideration of questions which, however urgent they may be, are equally important and deserving of some consideration.

I am glad that the representative of the British Empire, as well as the representative of the French Republic, has had foresight enough and broad sight enough to realize that the achievements of these 45 days are truly memorable and remarkable, considering the obstacles that have been in the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the address will be printed in the RECORD at the request of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The address is as follows:

Mr. BALFOUR. "Mr. President and gentlemen of the Press Club. You, sir, in your opening remarks, reminded me of the first day of my visit in this city, and have quoted one or two things that I then appeared to have said to the representatives of the press. That was about a month ago, and certainly, so far as I am concerned, the month that has elapsed since that fateful day has been filled with impressions the most pleasurable, the most momentous impressions, which will never fade from my memory while memory lasts, impressions of which I hope to give some faint and imperfect account, it may be, but still some account, to those I have left on the other side of the Atlantic, and who are engaged in the same great struggle and the same world work to which all of you are contributing so important a share.

"Gentlemen, I came to the United States conscious, of course, of the importance of the mission with which I have been intrusted by my Government; conscious, as your president has said this afternoon, that the mission, from the very nature of the case, was one of the most important in which either of our two countries has ever concerned itself; conscious that the very condition of the world in which we lived gave weight and importance to every action, to every word, and to every report of every word which might take place during its existence.

"Now, gentlemen, nobody knows better than I how much you and the great press that you represent have contributed to whatever measure of success our mission may have obtained. It is perfectly true that the primary duty intrusted to us was that of discussing with the Government of the United States the numberless matters of importance which have to be decided if two great countries find themselves cooperating in one gigantic task.

"The kindness with which we were received, the warmth of the welcome which reached us from all parts of the country, soon made it plain that the strictly and narrowly business side of our mission was not the only one which was important at the present juncture. After all, the cooperation of two great countries is not merely the question of working, through the instrumentality of experts, the sending of men here or there, the proper distribution of your naval forces, the method by which the financial cooperation can best be secured, or all the other endless questions which have come up for daily discussion. Those are all important. They do not stand alone. Something more than that, if a mission be fortunate, may come of its work, something which has not got to do with naval, military, or financial details, but which, in the phrase, I think it is of Burke, comes home to the feelings and bosoms of men. There is something in a sympathetic and mutual comprehension, there is something the worth of which can not indeed be estimated merely by enumerating army corps, or millions or billions of dollars, the cataloguing of destroyers, but which is represented by something different, more spiritual, as important; a sympathy of soul between two great and free peoples, who are not only engaged on a common task but are conscious of their mutual cooperation. [Applause.]

"Now, gentlemen, for my own part I have felt more deeply than I find it easy to express the kindness of the reception which you have given to the mission in general and to myself in particular. That kindness has been shown me, lavishly shown me, in Washington. It was shown not less fully and not less lavishingly in New York and in Richmond, and I only mourn that the inevitable exigencies of public business make it impossible for me to visit other parts of the United States, to communicate directly and personally with men in the Middle West, in the far West, and in other portions of this colossal territory, which is already occupied by the most powerful community in the world, and which is, I think, destined in the future to have an abiding influence for all that makes for peaceful civilization and freedom, and has certainly shown on the present occasion that a great community can be moved to perform great sacrifices for an ideal which has in it nothing of selfishness, nothing of the petty appetite for power, nothing but a pure and unstained desire to benefit the cause of civilization and of mankind. [Applause.]

"Gentlemen, that is the impression which I have received from the living intercourse that I have been able to have with a fraction—I admit too small a fraction, but not an unimportant fraction—of this great State. It would have been impossible for me to have obtained the impressions I have received or to have given the impressions I have desired to give without the assistance of the press of this country. You and those with whom you work have, after all, supplied the sensory nerves which permeate the whole country from end to end, and make what happens in Washington or New York, or wherever it may be, the common property of the whole American people. It is a colossal power. It is a power whose magnitude it is very difficult—it is impossible, I think—to overestimate. It is a power very easily abused. It is a power which those who possess it have to be cautious as to whether, in the ordinary work of what, after all, has a business side, and purely a business side, whether they may not commit some injury to the public weal, which they certainly never contemplated when they did it, and for which, perhaps, they might hardly regard themselves as directly responsible.

"Gentlemen, you have shown, during the month's experience which I have of your labors—shown that the American press is animated by the highest patriotic principles; that it is incapable, or has shown itself, so far as I am concerned, as incapable of misrepresenting or perverting in the smallest particular anything which I may have said or done. I know that it is to you and your friends that any word I have spoken, be it worth listening to or not worth listening to, at all events reaches unperverted those for whom it is intended. For that I wish to express to you my most grateful thanks, for what you have done since I have been here.

"Your president quoted an appeal which I appeared to have made—I have forgotten the exact circumstance—to some of your number a month ago. Never was an appeal more generously listened to or more faithfully accepted, both in the spirit and the letter, and I beg most sincerely to thank you for the way in which you have exercised your duties in connection with the mission for which I am responsible. These are, I suppose, the last words that I shall say in public before I leave the hospitable area of your great country. May I not only thank you, as I have just imperfectly tried to do, for the share you have taken in any such success as the mission may have had, but may I through you thank that much larger public to whom you appeal for the unprecedented personal kindness which they have shown to me and to all those that accompany me.

"I came with high hopes to Washington. Those hopes have been far surpassed by the reality. I expected, from what I knew of American friends on the other side of the Atlantic, that I should be received with kindness, with courtesy, and with sympathy, but the kindness, the courtesy, and the sympathy which I have received are far in excess of anything which I dared to hope for or anything which I can pretend even to myself to have deserved. It is a sad thought to me that the moment of parting has come, and that those whom I looked upon as my friends before I knew them, and who have become my friends in very truth and indeed since I know them, I shall be separated from, at all events, during the continuation of the present war. After that may it be my happy lot to return in a less responsible and official position to renew the connection for a moment severed by the tragic events in which we are all equally concerned.

"But, gentlemen, the mission could not stay here forever. It has received a welcome—a welcome which none of its members will forget—and to me falls the pleasant duty on my own behalf and on behalf of my friends of saying to you and to all whom you can reach how deeply we thank the American public for what they have done, how warm our recollections of their kindness, and, above all and more than all, how we leave this country even more convinced than we came to it that the United States of America, when they take a great cause in hand, a cause which appeals to none of the lower motives which animate communities as they may animate individuals, which appeals only to what is highest and best in the national conscience; when, I say, the American people take in hand a cause of which that may be said, they are not going to relinquish the pursuit, they are not for a moment going to relax their endeavors to bring the great enterprise to a successful conclusion until that successful conclusion is indeed safely within our grasp. That is the message which I shall take away from these shores.

"There are those who have said that the preparations made by the United States are proceeding slowly and haltingly, and that a country which has been in the war for some 40 days ought to have done far more than has actually been accomplished. For my own part, I think those who speak in accents like those know very little of the actual way in which public life is and must be carried on in free countries. At the beginning of the 40 days of which I speak no preparations had been made; the country was anxiously indeed watching the events; it had not begun to make any of the preparations necessary for taking part in a gigantic struggle. I think that what has been performed in those 40 days is most remarkable. It is quite true that the action of the executive government may be delayed and has been delayed by the fact that certain measures placed before Congress took some time to pass; some of them have not yet passed. But I have lived with representative assemblies all my life, and who is it that supposes that representative assemblies are going to make great and new departures in public policy solely at the waving of a wand? Such expectations are vain. It is useless to entertain them. And, for my own part, I am quite confident—I perhaps feel more confident than it seems to me one who has had no personal experience of American politics should feel—but, speaking for myself, I feel quite confident that Congress will not refuse to the President and the Government of the country all powers, great as they are, which are absolutely necessary if the war is to be successfully pursued. I am not only persuaded that it will give those powers, but I am persuaded that when those powers are given they will be used to the utmost with as little delay as the imperfection of human institutions and of human beings allow to throw the great and, I believe, the decisive weight of America to the full extent into the great contest. That is my belief.

"In that belief I shall leave these shores. In that belief I shall make my report to the allied Governments, so far as I can reach them, on the other side of the Atlantic, and in that belief I look forward with a cheerful confidence to days which will undoubtedly be days of trial and difficulty, but, beyond which we can surely see the dawn of a happier day, coming not merely to the kindred communities to which we belong, but to all mankind and all nations which love liberty and pursue righteousness. [Applause.]

"Mr. President, I will say no more. I thank you. Through you I thank every well-wisher in America for all that you have done for me and for my friends. I wish you a farewell. I wish for a reunion at no distant date, under happier circumstances, when we can meet, not feeling that we have to deal with a great crisis which requires all our capacity, all our courage, and all our perseverance, but that we can look back upon trials already successfully passed, upon days happily accomplished, upon a permanent peace for ourselves and for the rest of the world. Those are my hopes, Mr. President, and none can aid more efficiently than the gentlemen I am addressing in the fulfillment of the ideals which I am quite sure are common to all who speak our language, and to many others who sympathize with our aspirations.

"I beg to thank you." [Applause.]

FOOD CONTROL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a few days ago I sent to the desk and had read what purported to be an interview with Mr. Herbert C. Hoover in relation to the food supply of the country and his views and his aims upon that subject. I have since received a letter from Mr. Hoover, which I send to the desk and ask that it may be read. I desire to say that when I had the interview inserted in the RECORD it had been reprinted from a New York Journal on separate sheets of paper and evidently sent out to the newspapers of the country, for one of the newspapers, a small newspaper in my State, sent me this reprint. Several days had elapsed and I had no reason to suppose that the interview was not perfectly genuine. In justice to Mr. Hoover, I desire that the letter which he has written to me may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1917.

HON. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington.

DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to the newspaper article read at your request in the Senate and entered in Monday's RECORD.

I think it is only fair to myself to state that all but an infinitesimal basis of the statements contained in that article are absolute invention.

A gentleman called at my rooms and was admitted upon the basis that he had important technical information to give on food matters. He devoted himself to a bitter denunciation of various public men and officers of the Government as being in the pay of "interests" in opposition to his dietetic theories. I defended these gentlemen by offering some argument against his own views, and ultimately felt called upon to denounce strongly his unwarranted attitude toward men upon whose honor he or no man has any right to reflect.

Subsequently I learned that he was a reporter and later he introduced into my mouth through his journal the precise statements and phrases which he alone used and to which I objected.

I have little concern for any reflection there may be upon myself in such misrepresentation, as this seems to be the fate of those who would serve, but I am concerned that any statement wrongly reflecting upon others should be attributed to me or should be given currency against them.

Yours, faithfully, HERBERT C. HOOVER.

PROHIBITION OF ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Chair whether it is in order during the morning hour to enter a motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a measure? I find in the Rules that the second paragraph of Rule XXVI provides:

> All reports of committees and motions to discharge a committee from the consideration of the subject, and all subjects from which a committee shall be discharged, shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

That is the only reference I have found in the rules with regard to motions of this character. I simply desire an expression from the Chair whether or not such a motion can be entered during the morning hour or during the consideration of morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think that such a motion would be in order until after morning business is concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not desire to enter the motion this morning, but I wish to say that during the last Congress a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, providing for national prohibition was reported by the Judiciary Committee. Similar resolutions have been introduced at this session. They are very short. Simple legislation is involved. The committee gave the resolution last year a great deal of consideration, and I have no doubt that it is now prepared to express its judgment upon a resolution of that character at any time. I think also I am safe in suggesting that all Members of the Senate have reached a decision upon this question, which has been under consideration by the people of the country for many years; and that, if such a resolution were reported to the Senate, it could be voted upon without very much discussion.

I should like to suggest to the members of the Judiciary Committee, and to the chairman of that committee, that I hope the committee will take up the consideration of this resolution in the very near future and report it to the Senate in order that, if an opportunity should offer without interfering with matters which are of an emergency character, the Senate may have a chance to consider this resolution and probably reach some agreement with reference to a vote. This ought not to be difficult. We all know the sentiment of the country and of our constituents. We know our own views. The people have a right to have those views expressed by our vote. If two-thirds of the Senate favor this resolution they should say so. If more than one-third of the Senate are against such a resolution, their votes will defeat it. No valid reason can be urged against early action. No good excuse can be given for delaying a vote when the resolution is before the Senate.

I desire to suggest that unless action is taken by the committee within a reasonable time, I shall feel disposed to make a motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the subject that it may be brought before the Senate for action.

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1854) to save daylight and to provide a standard time for the United States, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 46) thereon.

OREGAN & CALIFORNIA RAILROAD CO. (S. DOC. NO. 35).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 69), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on May 22, 1917, entitled "Opinion of the United States Supreme Court in the Oregon & California Railroad Co. case, and public act 86, Sixty-fourth Congress, relating to lands granted the Oregon & California Railroad Co.," be printed as a Senate document.

POINTS OF HISTORIC INTEREST (S. DOC. NO. 36).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred Senate resolution 64, submitted by himself on the 14th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the pamphlet entitled "Points of Historic Interest in the National Capital," with accompanying illustrations, be printed as a Senate document, and that 5,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. SHIELDS. On April 9 I introduced a bill, being the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, which was inadvertently referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I ask that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1786) to amend certain sections of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALSH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2344) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

INDEPENDENCE OF BOHEMIA.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I offer a resolution, concerning which I expect to address the Senate at some future time. I will ask to have the resolution lie on the table, but, as a matter of proper procedure, I ask to have it read at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 70) was read, as follows:

Whereas the 15th day of November, 1915, a committee of leading Czechs and Slovaks issued in Paris a manifesto demanding an independent Bohemian-Slovak State; and

Whereas the Czechs (Bohemians) and Slovaks for centuries have suffered under alien domination; and

Whereas in this Nation there are 2,000,000 of people of Czech and Slovak blood, and in these critical days these people, with an unsurpassed devotion to the cause of liberty and independence, have rallied to the assistance of the Government of the United States; and

Whereas the President declared that by entering the war we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts, for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free; and

Whereas the President, writing about the Bohemians, almost 30 years ago declared, "No lapse of time, no defeat of hopes seems sufficient to reconcile the Czechs of Bohemia to incorporation with Austria. Pride of race and the memories of a notable and distinguished history keep them always at odds with the Germans within their gates and with the government set over their heads"; and

Whereas the powers with which our country is now allied declared the liberation of Czechs and Slovaks from foreign domination to be one of the conditions of future peace: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Bohemia ought to be of right free and independent; and be it further

Resolved, That upon the final termination of this war and in the adjustment of peace the United States shall insist on independence for Bohemians and Slovaks and upon the reconstruction of a Bohemian-Slovak State as an essential part of any just and democratic settlement at the end of the war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF DEFECTIVE ORDNANCE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I beg leave to submit for the consideration of the Senate the resolution which I send to the desk. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 71) was read, as follows:

Whereas a few days ago a lamentable accident occurred on the merchant ship Mongolia, whereby two Red Cross nurses, who were en route to the battle fields of Europe upon an errand of mercy, were instantly killed, said accident being due, it is charged, to defective shells employed in gun practice, under the direction of officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy; and

Whereas according to newspaper reports, based upon statements alleged to have been made by a rear admiral of the United States Navy previous accidents of a similar nature have occurred, though not attended by fatalities; and

Whereas this Nation is now engaged in the greatest war in the history of the world, in which its Navy is likely to play a conspicuous part, a participancy in which the element of accident should be reduced, if possible, to a negligible quantity: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate to make a careful inquiry into the causes of the recent accidents on shipboard due to defective ammunition, or otherwise, with a view to preventing similar occurrences hereafter.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which has just been read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the ranking member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, is not now in the Senate, and in his absence I object to the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will go over under the rule.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR LANE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 72), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President pro tempore in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator HARRY LANE, from the State of Oregon, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the foregoing resolution, subsequently reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROADS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. From the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 48) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on May 22, 1917, approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

S. 1006. An act authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county;

S. 1007. An act authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place; and

S. J. Res. 61. Joint resolution to grant authority for the erection of temporary buildings at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

FREIGHT CAR SHORTAGE.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. 328) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, in respect of car service, and for other purposes, which was to strike out the first four lines of the matter inserted by the amendment of the Senate, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 24, 1887, as heretofore amended, is further amended by adding thereto the following.

Mr. POMERENE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the amendment of the House read so that we may see what it proposes.

Mr. POMERENE. I will state it to the Senator.

The first paragraph of the substitute bill read as follows:

That an act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, be further amended and supplemented as follows.

Exception was taken to that language in the House, and for it they substituted the following:

That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 24, 1887, as heretofore amended, is further amended by adding thereto the following.

It is simply a technical amendment, and there is no reason why the Senate should not concur in it.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, at the time the Senate substitute was adopted we asked for a conference, and conferees were appointed. Of course, there was no occasion for a conference, and I assume from this that the conferees will be discharged.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The conferees will be automatically discharged.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 4280. An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

GREAT PIECE MEADOWS, N. J.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the Senate, but I should like to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a little measure of great importance now on the calendar. I refer to the bill (S. 282) making appropriation of $200,000 for the acquisition of a tract of land known as Great Piece Meadows, N. J., for a target range and camp ground. I feel assured that it will only require a moment to consider and pass the bill. I think there is no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill by title.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I inquire if morning business has been concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. WALSH. Then the motion would not be in order, would it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent has been asked for by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. WALSH. When morning business is concluded, the calendar will be in order, will it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will, unless otherwise directed by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Possibly the Senator might be able to secure consideration of the bill in its regular order, then, this morning.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If it is understood that it will come up in the regular order, I will defer my request. I understand, Mr. President, that there is a special order or a special bill on the calendar which is to be taken up, and I spoke to the chairman of the committee and asked him for his permission to take up this measure. He agreed to it, and suggested that I take it up at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill can be taken up only by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I asked unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair stated. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 282) making an appropriation of $200,000 for the acquisition of a tract of land known as Great Piece Meadows, N. J., for a target range and camp ground.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the acquisition, by purchase or condemnation, of tract of land known as Great Piece Meadows and other contiguous tracts, and situated in Essex and Morris Counties, in the State of New Jersey, and within 30 miles of New York City Hall, to provide suitable target-range facilities for instruction in small-arms practice and for the construction thereon of target butts, buildings, water supply and drainage system, and other facilities; for targets and other necessary equipment and the installation of same, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, to be immediately available, and to remain available until expended, $250,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether there is a written report recommending the passage of this bill, and if so, who made the report?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the estimate has been made by the War Department and is in the report, including a recommendation from the Secretary of War urging that this appropriation be made for this tract of land. The project was under contemplation by the War Department prior to my incumbency, and it was surveyed by one of the officers of the department. It is urgently desired by the War Department at this time in order to train in marksmanship the men who are to be part of the draft. The Secretary of War wrote a letter to the Military Affairs Committee recommending the purchase of this tract, and the Military Affairs Committee unanimously approved the bill as amended.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey what is the size of this tract?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Over 4,000 acres.

Mr. KENYON. How much is the Government to pay?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Government is to pay $182,000 for the tract by condemnation or purchase. It belongs to a number of owners, and it will be necessary to condemn it to procure it.

Mr. KENYON. This has been asked for by the Secretary of War?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It has, and has been recommended by him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the purchase or condemnation of a site for a target range at or near Great Piece Meadows, in the State of New Jersey."

NAIL THE FLAG TO THE PLOW.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a moment. Pertinent to the subject of food control I received this morning a few lines written by my friend Hon.

W. B. Lockwood, a distinguished young lawyer of Crystal Springs, Miss., entitled "Nail the flag to the plow," which I desire to read into the RECORD. I commend the philosophy of these lines to the American people:

Nail the flag to the plow—
The country needs grain
While the sailor boys guard
The tracks of the main.
God gave you the fields
And the sun with its light;
Then double their yields
While the sailor boys fight.

Nail the flag to the plow—
The soldiers must eat
While defending the trenches
Or suffer defeat.
You can help the brave soldier
At this time of his need
By increasing your acres
And planting more seed.

Nail the flag to the plow—
Your children and wife
Must be saved from starvation
While the world is in strife.
Your duty is plain;
Your mission is grand;
Each man is a hero
Who's tilling the land.

You say you're too old
To fight with a gun;
Then work in the fields
Till the setting of sun
And show to the world
By the sweat on your brow
That you're serving your country
With a flag on your plow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2344.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2344) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, because there is so much of false information being furnished the country, and because I think that always we ought to act with reference to the facts as they exist, I venture to ask the attention of the Senate to certain statements that have been made regarding "gambling in grain, the creation of corners, the robbery of the farmer, and the plundering of the consumer."

I remark, by way of preliminary, that no one can go further than I am willing to go in order to reach any man who undertakes to corner the foodstuffs of this country, to artificially increase their price, or to do any of those other acts which have for their purpose the despoliation of either the producer or the consumer.

I have already said, and repeat, that, of course, there has been some speculation in foodstuffs. I have no doubt there have been some corners worked in foodstuffs, speaking generally; but I desire especially to direct attention to the condition of the wheat market. I have had some occasion to investigate that question with care, and I believe that the general opinion of the country is based upon misstatements of fact, and that some attention ought to be given to the facts as they exist.

Mr. President, the commonest statement that we hear to-day is to the effect, first, that the farmer parted with his wheat at about $1.30 a bushel or less; second, that the wheat was at that price acquired by a lot of speculators and held by them until the price was forced up to nearly $3 a bushel, and then unloaded upon the consumers of the country. That is the general statement that is commonly understood to be true. I affirm that it is in all its great essentials absolutely a mistake. We ought to get at the facts. I want to submit some of the facts.

In line with the public opinion which I have referred to is a statement charged to Mr. Hoover. I assumed until this morning that of course Mr. Hoover made the statement, because I found it in the public prints of the country; but in view of the fact that a great newspaper printed what purported to be an authentic interview with Mr. Hoover, and not only printed it but caused copies of the interview to be mailed to every Senator and every Congressman, I am somewhat timorous about quoting anything that any man may have said simply because it may have appeared in the public papers. I do not say that in criticism of the papers, but I say it lest I should be informed to-morrow morning that the quotation I am about to read is altogether an error. I hope if the interview I am about to quote is not authentic we may have a speedy refutation.

It is stated in the papers generally throughout the country, under date of May 11, that Mr. Hoover made this statement:

> For instance, I am assured that the American farmer did not realize $1.30 per bushel for the 1916 wheat harvest, yet the price of wheat in New York to-day is $3.25 per bushel, and flour is $14 per barrel, with all its attendant hardships and dislocation of social and industrial life.
> I have no hesitation in saying that if the able, patriotic men representing the majority of each branch of the food trades were called in and clothed with the necessary powers to force the small minority of skunks that exist in every trade, one result would be that an equally nutritious flour based on even $1.50 wheat could be sold in New York for a good deal under $8 per barrel, and every trade would receive its legitimate profit.

The statement, Mr. President, in the first paragraph amounts to a charge that the farmer was compelled to part with his wheat for less than $1.30 per bushel, and that the speculators—or, to use the word Hoover employs, the "skunks"—have run the price up to $3.25 a bushel, and that but for "the skunks" the price could be reduced to $1.50.

I repeat, now, Mr. Hoover may never have given out this interview. I simply know it was sent out by the press associations. Reading the article, the casual reader would be led to believe that the speculators bought all the wheat at less than $1.30, held the wheat, and are now selling it to the public at $3.25.

The facts are, Mr. President—and I want to impress this on the Senate—(a) that the price paid to the farmer has all along been the basic price paid by the consumer. By this I mean that the price paid to the farmer, plus the rates of transportation, plus the ordinary commissions and charges of the middlemen and miller, has been the price the consumer has paid for his wheat when it has been transmuted into flour.

Now, that is an important statement. If true, it goes to the very bottom of these alleged outrages. It removes the cause for that excitement which is to-day setting the country by its ears, because the excitement is based upon the idea, as I have stated, that the farmer was "bilked" out of his wheat for a price less than $1.30 and that the consumer was compelled to buy flour based on $3.25 wheat.

I repeat that the facts are that, starting with the basic farm price and adding the ordinary and usual charges for transportation, the ordinary and usual expenses of handling, and the ordinary and usual profits of the middlemen, speaking by and large—making allowance, of course, for some fluctuations that naturally come, which are only of the ordinary character—the wheat has reached the consumer at a price commensurate with and based upon the farm price.

The second proposition I make is that there has been no abnormal hoarding.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. For a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. For a suggestion.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to be diverted. I have laid down some propositions which I intend to discuss.

Mr. McCUMBER. It will be along the same line the Senator is speaking, and I thought perhaps he would, before going into the other subject, like to hear it.

Mr. REED. Certainly; I could not decline to yield to my friend.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply desire to suggest that while the relation between the present farm price and the price of flour is about as the Senator has suggested, and I think he is practically correct, nevertheless, the great bulk of the wheat in the United States was sold some time ago, mostly in the fall of 1916, before the price had risen to the extraordinary charge that was made. I thought the Senator would take that into account.

Mr. REED. I stated that; but what I said in connection with it was that the flour made from that wheat was sold to the people at a price proportionate to the price the farmer received for his wheat.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is correct.

Mr. REED. I said that the consumer was not robbed at one end and the farmer at the other, and where the farmer sold his wheat cheap flour was correspondingly cheap.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator yield to me just for a question?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. What was the figure the Senator stated was given by Mr. Hoover that the farmer received for his wheat in 1916?

Mr. REED. It was less than $1.30.

Mr. KENYON. Before the committee, if the Senator will turn to page 380 of volume 4, he will find Mr. Hoover there stated it at from $1.30 to $1.40.

Mr. REED. In the interview it is stated at $1.30. I am not saying this to criticize Mr. Hoover. I am reading Mr. Hoover's statement, because it furnishes a part of the basis of this public opinion. Many things Mr. Hoover said were correct, but in some things I think there are inaccuracies. However, I want to keep to my theme if I can, and while I am not going to decline to answer questions, until I get a little further along I wish Senators would kindly indulge me.

I say the second proposition I make is that there has been no abnormal hoarding of wheat. The table which I am about to introduce, which has been prepared with care, will show, first, that Mr. Hoover is in error when he states that the farmer did not realize $1.30 a bushel for his 1916 wheat, on the average. The fact is he received an average price of between $1.44 and $1.50.

Second. While the farmer sold during the months of July and August, 1916, for less than $1.30 the price of flour was proportionately low. Also the price of flour, subject to slight variations, consistently followed the price of wheat throughout all the year 1916. Thus it appears when the farmer was getting a low price for his wheat the consumer was getting flour at low prices, the benefit of the low-price wheat being carried along to the ultimate consumer. When the farmer was getting high prices for his wheat the price of flour was likewise increased.

Third. The table shows that there was not during the year 1916 at any time any abnormal concentration or hoarding of wheat.

Fourth. The table shows that at the time the exceedingly high prices were reached the central markets, the markets that were supposed to be controlled by the grain men in the great cities, were practically denuded of wheat and these grain dealers practically had no wheat to sell for the high prices.

In this connection I will simply read a statement from the Kansas City Star of May 11, which is one of the days when grain rose to an enormous price. It is the market report of the Star that I am reading, not its ordinary news items:

Kansas City is in better condition than Chicago, because elevators here contain more than one and one-half million bushels of wheat, while in Chicago the stocks have been almost completely exhausted, amounting to only about 200,000 bushels.

That is to say, in one of the largest grain markets of the world there was practically no wheat at all. Two hundred thousand bushels at Chicago means that Chicago was out of wheat.

The fourth proposition that I think the table demonstrates is that the high price of wheat did not come until the supply was exceedingly low.

I now desire to present the table, and I ask to have it printed without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

[1] May wheat.

[2] July.

Mr. REED. I wish to call attention in enforcement of what I have said to certain statements.

New wheat begins to reach market about the 1st of July.

On the 1st of July, 1916, Chicago cash wheat was $1.02 to $1.06. Chicago futures were $1.02 to $1.03½.

On July 8 the prices were substantially the same. The agriculture report gives us the farm price of that day, and the farm price was 92.9 cents. The price of a barrel of flour runs the year around about four and one-half times the price of a bushel of wheat at the Chicago market. It takes 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. The miller sells the flour for substantially four and one-half times the price of a bushel of wheat, getting his profit out of the by-products. The price will run from four and one-half to four and three-fourths times the price of wheat in normal times.

Now, observe the price of Chicago wheat on July 8 was $1.01 to $1.07. The farm value was 92.9 cents. The price of flour was $5.40 to $5.60, running a little above the four and one-half times. Always through the year there is that sort of fluctuation, flour sometimes going a little above four and one-half times the price of wheat, sometimes a little below.

The visible supply on that day, July 8, which means the supply of wheat that was in the great central markets of the country, was 41,820,000 bushels. The wheat that moved at that price to the 11 primary markets and which represents the farmers' wheat was only 4,195,000 bushels. The export of wheat from the United States on that day was 3,163,000 bushels. Nearly three-fourths as much was shipped away from the country as was shipped to the primary markets.

I shall only cite certain figures merely for illustration. Coming to August 12, I find that the price of wheat at Chicago had risen to $1.34½ to $1.47¾. Those are the two extreme prices. The farm value was $1.071. The price of flour had risen to $7.30 to $7.80. There was a visible supply of wheat in the big centers of 48,760,000 bushels. On that day the movement of wheat at the 11 primary markets which represent the farmers' wheat and wheat from county elevators was 11,827,000 bushels.

The farmer had begun marketing his wheat as soon as it went above a dollar, and for several days he marketed about 10,000,000 bushels daily. But on those same days there were shipped, as the figures will show, all the way from seven to nearly nine million bushels of wheat out of the country. It was exported and sent away. It is that movement which accounts for some advance in the price of flour, but nothing of an abnormal or a remarkable nature.

Coming to September 9, wheat had risen in Chicago to $1.51–$1.57⅞. The farmers' price had risen to $1.31⅞. The visible supply had risen to 53,970,000 bushels. The movement of wheat, that on the primary markets which is the farmers' wheat, was 9,270,000 bushels. So the farmer on that day was getting at his farm value $1.31. Of course, that is an average price, and means that the 20 cents between his price and the Chicago market was eaten up in freight charges, and so forth. He was really getting the full benefit of the $1.50 price, because always he sells the Chicago market less, of course, the cost of transportation, the freight charges, and so forth.

Moreover, I have this to say, that I think these average prices to the farmer are below what the farmer actually received, because I think there was a gross error made by some of those who made the estimate in the Agricultural Department. I am not prepared to exactly charge that.

Mr. President, I could go through this table; but Senators who will take the trouble to look at it as it appears in the RECORD will get a much plainer view than I can give them. As you go through this table, you will find these prices are set out, and glancing your eye over them you will observe that it is practically a complete demonstration that the price paid to the farmer forms the basic price clear through to the ultimate consumer, and that when wheat was cheap to the farmer flour was cheap to the baker. There is a fluctuation of approximately a dollar a barrel above the normal in the price of flour, which is easily accounted for by the fact that these enormous shipments were being constantly made abroad, the flour being drawn out of the country at a very rapid rate.

It will also be observed in studying the table that the excessive price of wheat came after the supply of wheat, whether held by the dealer or farmer, was largely exhausted, the natural thing being a rise under those circumstances—an unavoidable result.

Mr. President, the table I have submitted, together with other facts to follow, demonstrates that the reason for the rise in the price of wheat must be sought outside market speculations. We must look to something besides the cornering of the wheat by speculators. We must look to something besides men going out and buying up the actual wheat and storing it or holding it away from the public, because it appears that there has all along been a steady flow of wheat from the farms to the mill or from the farms to Europe; that there has been a consistent maintenance of proportionate prices throughout the year. Nevertheless there has came the enormous rise in the price of wheat. It also appears there has been no large hoarding in the cities. When wheat rose to its highest value the visible supply of wheat, by which I mean the wheat that is held in large citiese, had sunk to a very low point. For instance, while ordinarily there are from fifty to sixty million bushels of wheat kept as a visible supply in these centers, that supply had sunk to 33,000,000 on the 11th day of May, being far below the average that ought to be maintained. So we must look for some other reason for this enormous rise in the price of wheat. And, Mr. President, we do not have to look far.

The first of these great causes is a natural world shortage of over 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. But there is in addition to the actual shortage an artificial shortage of approximately 300,000,000 bushels of wheat. That artificial shortage arises from the circumstance that Russia is a large exporter of wheat, and the Russian market has been cut off by the war, the Dardanelles have been closed, and the wheat is in Russia instead of being in England and France and other countries where they want it.

In addition to that, Australia is a large producer of wheat and has a large surplus of wheat now, but Australia can not land her wheat with the usual readiness in Europe because of a lack of shipping and because of the other war conditions which we know exist.

So there is practically a shortage of approximately 400,000,000 bushels of wheat. That in itself would account in a very large measure for the rise in the price. There are two remedies for the shortage. One is to build ships to carry the grain from Australia, and the other is for the armies of the allies to break open the door so that Russian wheat can reach them. The Argentine wheat crop has been poor; it is a shortage.

Mr. President, I come now to another great cause that has largely controlled the American market and finally forced wheat to an unprecedented price. I will perhaps astonish some of my associates, although I will not astonish any man who has been watching the grain trade closely, by saying that the cause I refer to is the operations of our allies in the wheat markets of the United States.

Mr. President, it is pretty thoroughly established that the allies have bought enormous quantities of wheat in this country. Their purchases have run, according to the best information I can get, to over 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. Those purchases have been in the nature of futures; that is, the purchases of wheat for future delivery; they have constantly carried along their futures from time to time, and have done it in such a way as to probably reap a very large profit on the transactions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to ask a question at that point.

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understood the Senator to say that the aggregate purchases of wheat by the allies was in the neighborhood of 100,000,000 bushels.

Mr. REED. I mean by that their purchases for future delivery. They have amounted, according to the best estimates I can get, to from one hundred to one hundred and fifty million bushels.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator from Missouri in mind the period of time during which those purchases were made?

Mr. REED. I think that they were made very early, and that they then were carried along, as I shall show. What I am about to give now is an analysis which has been made by a man whom I regard as one of the best experts in the United States upon wheat-market conditions. This gentleman has no interest in making a statement that would be incorrect. He is at present in Washington, and any committee so desiring can have his testimony and cross-examine him. I give the statement which I am about to read as his, because it is a clearer statement than I could make. Frankly, I am not an expert upon the wheat market, never having yet bought a future or sold any wheat, except wheat that I have actually had in a wagon when I used to live on a farm. This gentleman states:

> The greatest bull influence in the American wheat markets has unquestionably been the concentrated holdings by purchasing agents acting for the allied countries. It is a matter of common gossip and of absolute belief among the best informed and most conservative grain merchants of the country that their holdings of futures has exceeded any concentration ever approached in this country by any other organization or individual. It is a matter of common belief, based on accurate observation, that they began to buy Chicago, Minneapolis, Kansas City, St. Louis, and even Winnipeg wheat futures on every break in the market, beginning at the time the 1916 crop began to move. Their total holdings have probably been as much as or greater than 100,000,000 bushels. These holdings have been kept intact to a greater or less extent as they filled their cash wheat requirements from month to month. There was a limitation to the amount they could move, due to scarcity of ocean room and congested railroad conditions in this country. Hence—

Now, follow this and see how these interests have profited and see how thoroughly they will control the market—

> Hence as May approached they owned wheat futures far in excess of the amount of actual wheat they could secure for forwarding during the given delivery period. This concentration of holdings resulted in May wheat going to a huge premium over July, a premium so great as to stagger the grain men of the country, and in many instances to cause American merchants heavy losses. The foreigners are said to have sold out much of the May wheat they owned and replaced it by the purchase of July wheat, securing the latter at a discount of 20 to 50 cents per bushel under May wheat. Their holdings of July wheat were so large and the cash demand for wheat so urgent as to force the July wheat to as high as 42 cents premium over September wheat and the cash wheat to an even greater premium over July. Instead of relieving the market congestion by a sale of their future holdings (that is, July wheat), they merely sold out the July and bought September, which has in no wise relieved the strain under which the market has been. Their first purchases of future wheat having been made, we will say, as low as $1.25, and the purchasing continuing up to the time that the May wheat reached $2, they had an average cost of probably $1.50. This wheat was sold out and July bought, the latter, as above stated, at a big discount under the May, which would, in effect, reduce the cost of the future wheat they owned and which was still kept intact. Later the concentration of holdings of July, as stated, made it very profitable for the buyers representing the foreign country to sell out their July wheat and purchase September at a discount, as previously stated, of 20 to 40 cents, this profit again reducing the first cost of their grain. The result is that in exchanging their futures for cash wheat, which is the process used by export traders, the huge profits on their future holdings have so reduced the cost of their cash wheat that the allied buyers are probably at this time, through their profits, securing wheat and flour for their Government at 75 cents to $1.50 less than wheat and flour, on $3 basis, is costing the American consumer.

Now, Mr. President, there is the "bug under the chip." I do not say this in any way to criticize our allies. I, however, regard it as necessary to call attention to the real causes for the advance in the price of grain. When we know the cause of our troubles we may remedy them. Manifestly, if our allies have been injuriously cornering the market and running prices to an extravagant level, our Government in negotiations with the representatives of our allies can easily arrest the evil result by removing its cause. That can be accomplished without attacking the business of the United States or upsetting conditions that ought not to be disturbed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question for information? I want light.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If our allies can affect the price by gambling or speculating in wheat or grain—and that can be done also quite as easily by private individuals—does not the Senator think that such practices ought to be prohibited generally?

Mr. REED. I think that that sort of thing, of running prices up by gambling operations, ought to be stopped. Now, let the Senator not get me wrong in attempting to quote me. I know he did not mean to get me wrong.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No.

Mr. REED. But I am not charging the allies with gambling. I am talking to the few Senators who are here—and it is almost useless to talk when there is no one to listen——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, we are listening very attentively.

Mr. REED. I know the few Senators who are here are listening. I do not charge the allies with gambling. This is what I understand they did. They bought a large amount of wheat——

Mr. VARDAMAN. They bought more than they really expected to use, did they not?

Mr. REED. No; they bought a large amount of wheat—probably 100,000,000 bushels.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The statement the Senator read was to the effect that the allies had bought in excess of their necessities, as I understood it.

Mr. REED. No; the Senator is in error about that. Let me state what the facts are. They bought a large amount of wheat, probably 100,000,000 bushels. They bought that for May delivery or for July delivery, at some future time—and the time is not important in this illustration—and it was to be delivered to them at a certain price. When that time arrived there were not enough ships to carry the grain and not enough railroad facilities to transport it. Therefore they could not have gotten their grain to Europe if they had desired to do so, but they had so much grain bought that they practically controlled the market. Having bought 100,000,000 bushels of wheat and the wheat not being there to be delivered when due, the man who had sold them this wheat had to get it some way, and hence had to run the price up. Now, when that condition arose the allies said, "All right, we will sell some of our wheat to you," and they sold probably nearly all of it, and they made a profit.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The effect of which was to lower the price of wheat.

Mr. REED. The effect of which was for them to make a profit; and, of course, when it comes to supply and demand every man who sells any wheat naturally lowers the price by that much.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It lowers the price of wheat held by the farmer.

Mr. REED. The effect of it is that they, having an order for 100,000,000 bushels, let go at a profit of a part of their own wheat to fill their own order, if you please. That would be the effect in the long run. Now, having sold their wheat, or a part of it, they proceeded to buy more wheat.

Mr. VARDAMAN. For less than they sold the wheat which they had disposed of?

Mr. REED. Yes; for less than they sold that wheat.

Mr. BRADY. For a different delivery.

Mr. REED. For a different delivery; a delivery at a future time. The difficulty with this thing, and the wrong or evil, if there be any evil in it, consists in the fact that such an enormous quantity of wheat is in one holding, and thus that holding can control the market. If a market can be controlled and the price run up by a gambler who has bought a vast amount of grain, it can likewise be controlled by the agents of great Governments who have, even in perfect good faith, bought a similar quantity of grain. It is the buying of the enormous amount of wheat and its holding in one hand and the demand at the same time for an enormous quantity of wheat that runs the price up.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But I say it can be done without regard to the motive that moves the man who speculates in it, and it therefore makes the product of the farmer the sport, so to speak, of the man who speculates in it, and an individual operating for himself can do it as well as a Government, if the individual has the money.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is the pernicious effect of the whole speculating system.

Mr. REED. I would be led away from my theme, and perhaps I would get into water deeper than I am capable of navigating if I should pursue the thought suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator unduly. I have been asking him questions solely for information, because my information on the subject is very limited.

Mr. REED. I will simply say to the Senator that I know of no man in the Senate and no man outside of it who more thoroughly wants always to get at the facts and the truth of a matter than the Senator from Mississippi. The effect of a man going out and buying an enormous quantity of wheat must be to advance the market. That advance comes immediately to the farmer, because, as I have shown, the farm prices follow the prices of the market under normal conditions. Of course, abnormal conditions I am not discussing. So that if the allies bought 100,000,000 bushels of wheat to be delivered in the future that tended at once to raise the value of every bushel of wheat in the country. Of course, when the day came for the delivery of the wheat, if they demanded the actual delivery of the entire 100,000,000 bushels, they probably could have run the price of wheat almost to the sky.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. REED. In a moment. But if they let go any part of it they, to that extent, stop the price from going higher.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then I can only say that it is true that when we cut the dam it lowers the water behind the dam. However, here is the point to which I desire to call the Senator's attention, namely: That the price does not rise proportionately while the speculators are buying the wheat from the farmer. It is only after the speculator gets a great volume of it that he forces up the price.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The farmer who sells the last few bushels before the speculator cuts the dam and turns the flood loose gets the benefit of the rise, but the great majority of the farmers, while the speculator is cornering the market, get no appreciable increased price. The speculator moves in a cautious and mysterious way until he has gotten the market cornered, then he turns it loose and reaps the profit. The farmer does not get it, but the speculator pockets it and somebody bears the loss.

Mr. REED. The Senator is in error in saying that the farmer gets no benefit. Every normal demand that is made in the market for grain reaches back to the farmer instantly. When the purchaser begins to buy futures, whether an individual or a great Government, the tendency is always of course to strengthen the market. The evil arises from the fact that once enormous holdings are gathered under one control the market may be dominated and prices arbitrarily fixed. This is, I think, what was done by the agents of our allies.

Whoever can control a great body of wheat of that kind, whether he is a speculator, whether he is a foreign government, or whatever the control may be, can to a large extent control the market and do it so that he makes money out of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, is it not a fact that when a man or a number of men start out to corner the market these purchases are made surreptitiously?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. So that before the country knows the scheme they are bent upon accomplishing they have gotten control of the wheat at a low price, and when they gather all of their holdings together it is then that it goes up, and the speculator enjoys the profits, while the producer whose labor produces the wheat gets practically no raise at all.

Mr. REED. No; the statement the Senator makes is extreme and too broad. I say to the Senator that if he will examine this table, which is just simply the market prices—to get out of the realm of speculation and into the realm of fact—he will find out that, for instance, when wheat went above $1 a bushel the farmer at that price let go—I am using round figures—of 11,000,000 bushels a day.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator whether that was the farmer letting go of the wheat or the elevator man, or the man who had originally bought it from the farmer and stored it? It seems to me very likely that a good deal of that wheat had long since passed from the hand of the farmer and gone to the elevator people, or the people who control large quantities of the product.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I want to answer one question at a time. I will yield in a moment.

I want to be perfectly frank in answering the question which the Senator from Florida has just asked me. There are no figures obtainable which will tell how much the farmers had in their bins at any given time. I might as well say in passing that at least many figures we receive from the Agricultural Department are necessarily estimates. They estimate the crop of this year, but of course it may be inaccurate. My informant states to me, however, that when you get the movement of grain to the 11 primary markets, it is for the most part farmers' grain.

Now, that may be misinformation. I am giving it to the Senate with the statement that the man who makes it to me is of very high character, and I think really a great expert in the grain business, and not a speculator.

I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think this abnormal condition has been brought about principally from the fact that some people have been willing to sell wheat futures who did not have the wheat, and the fact that our allies, who have been buying these futures, have been willing to take all of the cash wheat which could be brought forward, has enabled them to successfully corner the wheat market, whereas an individual seeking purposely to corner the wheat market might run a very great risk in doing that, because after having bought this large number of wheat futures he would be unable to handle the actual cash wheat which might be delivered?

Mr. REED. The Senator's question is a combination of two or three questions and some observations; but, if I get him right, the Senator practically agrees with me that the ability of the allied Governments or their representatives to purchase enormous quantities of wheat futures, and then, when the time for delivery came, either to accept the wheat if it was handed to them or to sell it, as they saw fit, put them in a position of tremendous power and enabled them practically to control the market; that, Mr. President, is the one lesson I am trying to drive home. If we get that in our minds, I think there is a remedy, and a very simple and plain means for eradicating one of the causes for high prices.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think the real vice of the situation comes from the fact that some people are selling something which they have not got?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that leads into a field which is so broad that I should hesitate to try to explore it at this time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I am moved by the remark of the Senator from New Mexico to observe that it seems to be accepted by a great many people that there is something wrong about a man's selling what he has not got. Why, that is a perfectly commendable thing in the business world. Business in many departments rests upon just exactly that thing.

A man goes out to Europe and takes a lot of orders for the manufacture and delivery of a line of goods. He has not got the goods made. He has not even got the raw material out of which he expects to make them; but he goes out and gets the orders, and accordingly he goes out and provides himself with the raw materials, and he manufactures them, and he completes the order.

It is the same way in the matter of wheat. Flour merchants have their agents all over the world. They have not got the flour in their warehouses. They have not even got in their elevators the wheat to make the flour, but they know where they can go out and buy it; and so they go all over the world, and they actually sell flour—that is to say, they take orders for flour. Now, what is there in all this that ought to move Congress to interpose to interrupt it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to disclaim any intention of criticizing the business transaction just detailed by the Senator from Montana. Those things do occur legitimately; and so, in the wheat market, it is perfectly legitimate for a man to sell wheat for future delivery when he has not got it, provided he can go out and get it. But the thing which has caused the trouble in this particular situation is that people have sold these futures to such an extent that they could not go out and get the wheat and perform their contracts; and that, whether the intention originally was right or wrong, has resulted in the very condition that is confronting the country to-day.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, of course everybody recognizes that that situation may easily arise, and it is a very embarrassing one when it does arise. A man goes out and makes a contract to deliver so many barrels of flour or so many bushels of wheat. He is perfectly confident that he can get it, but when he goes out into the market he finds that other people have taken orders and that the market is oversold. Those conditions frequently arise. So a man may take an order to deliver a certain quantity of a manufactured product. He figures not only that he is obliged to get the raw material but that he has got to get the labor to work it up; and he is confident in the belief that he will be able to get it and will be able to produce the stuff within the time required by his contract. He goes and gets his raw material all right enough, but he finds that the labor market is crowded, and he is not actually able to get the men to do the work. So it often happens that the manufacturers are not able to complete their contracts within the time by reason of the fact that they can not get the labor. They eventually do get it; but it could very easily happen that a dealer might, in perfect good faith, count on being able to meet a contract, but finds that the raw material is not available, and he can not meet it. Of course in that event he has got to suffer a suit for damages.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not questioning the good faith or imputing bad faith, but I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if it is not a fact that this abnormal condition has been brought about because people have sold futures when they could not get the wheat?

Mr. WALSH. I should not be surprised if there is much in that. My information about the matter is, as the Senator has been advised by the Senator from Missouri, that one or more of the foreign Governments placed orders for great quantities of wheat. I dare say somebody in this country contracted with them to deliver that wheat to them, and then he went out to get the wheat, and he found that the supply was not in the country with which to meet his contract, or, at least, it was here in such limited quantities that when the brokers went to work all over the country to buy the wheat with which to meet the orders it naturally rose to phenomenal prices. That, of course, is bound to occur.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that there is a vast distinction between the illustration which the Senator from Montana has given and the purchasing of wheat on the wheat market. There is not one case out of twenty where a person buys futures where he ever expects to have delivery of that wheat to him, whereas in the manufacture of any article no one takes orders unless he has the means with which to produce the article.

Take the case of steel products: They are all contracted for in advance, of course, because they are generally of special designs that have to be manufactured, and contracts for them are made with the people who manufacture the steel. They do not have some one that is not a dealer in steel products at all contracting for steel products. But in the case of the wheat market, and in the case of sales upon the boards of trade, men are continually buying wheat every day who never expect the delivery of the wheat, and never expect to buy it, but expect to forfeit the margin which they put up; and the margin is all that is put up. It does seem to me that when that is done it has a tendency to abnormally raise the price of the wheat.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon just a further word, there is no doubt of the fact, as stated by the Senator from Colorado, that a very large percentage of the transactions in wheat that are conducted upon the boards of trade are pure gambling transactions. There is not any doubt in the world about that. I undertake to say that perhaps 75 per cent of them are of that character. But, Mr. President, the point I am trying to impress upon the minds of the Senators who do me the honor to listen is that these things are organized in the first place as market places, where men can go who have wheat to sell and meet men who have wheat to buy; and I am addressing myself to the legitimate transaction of buying and selling futures in wheat.

Of course, the gambling transactions that are suggested by the Senator from Colorado do get in, and a very large proportion of them. Neither party to the transaction expects to deliver the wheat, but simply to pay off whatever loss or gain there may be by reason of the rise or fall of the market. Thus, Mr. President, our legislation ought to be, as it seems to me, directed to efforts to penalize the gambling transaction, and we ought not to attempt by ill-considered legislation to deal with the matter of legitimate transactions in the purchase and sale of wheat, even though the man who buys or sells has not the wheat in the elevator at the time he makes the contract.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the discussion that has taken place is somewhat aside from the theme that I want to follow. As I stated to the Senator from New Mexico, it is too broad a field for me to enter upon at this time. I do not want to detain the Senate long. I have been on my feet much longer than I had expected. I am trying, as far as possible, to elucidate the reasons for the present price of wheat. I am trying also to show that that price of wheat was not caused by a cornering of the wheat market by the wheat speculators of this country, but that it was caused largely—not entirely, but largely—by the enormous holdings of the allies.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one moment. I am trying, in addition to that, to show that the consumer had the benefit of the low-priced wheat which the farmer sold, and that it is not true that men bought up all the wheat in the country at a dollar a bushel or less than $1.20 or $1.30, held it, and advanced the price to the people who had to have flour; but that this wheat, starting from the farmer at a low price, went on to the consumer at a low price, and that as the price was raised to the consumer it was proportionately raised to the farmer. That of course is only a general statement. I do not mean that exactly every bushel went through under those circumstances, but that that was the general line and the general course of trade. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator, I think, is substantially accurate and will be borne out by the facts in the wheat market. I think the statement of the Senator from Montana is substantially correct. These are the conditions, I will state to the Senator from Missouri, attending the bulge in May wheat. The record sustains the statement I am making. Along in the early part of this month the representatives of the allies bought in Chicago on the board of trade more than 500,000 bushels of wheat for May delivery. This was in the largest single wheat market in the world. That was all bought in the wheat pit in a single grain exchange. When those who had knowledge of the market and the quantity of wheat stored in the Chicago elevators investigated they found in the entire wheat market in Chicago 150,000 bushels to fill the 500,000-bushel order. The bulge in wheat to which reference has been made here immediately followed on discovering that condition, and the disturbed state of the market ensued that we saw in many quotations.

Mr. REED. The Senator's statement bears out exactly what I have been urging.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there was a shortage in wheat for 1916, in last year's crop, as compared with the crop of 1915, of 400,000,000 bushels. Of course that has been an important factor in raising the price of wheat to such an abnormally high figure.

Mr. REED. I discussed that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I was not in the Chamber during all the Senator's speech. I heard a portion of it. It does seem to me that this May wheat rise is very largely due to the fact that it was not fully discovered as to what the shortage was, and consequently they did not know the quantity of wheat in the warehouses.

Mr. REED. I am coming to that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to give the Senator a point that it seems to me goes to the observation made by the Senator from Illinois. The price did not begin to jump up and develop in an abnormal way until after it was discovered that they had but 150,000 bushels of wheat in the elevators in Chicago. The reason why it jumped up so rapidly after that discovery was made was because the people who sold short began to scramble to get wheat with which to fill their contracts.

Mr. REED. Certainly, that is the fact. There is not anything mysterious about this business. If Mr. Patten had gone out in the United States and bought 100,000,000 bushels of wheat for delivery at any given time and had bought it secretly and nobody knew anything about it and suddenly he called for the 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, undoubtedly he would have caught all his antagonists napping.

The demand would have been so great it could not have been supplied and Patten would have settled with his victims on his own terms. That would have been a wheat corner by Mr. Patten. It would have been a thing we would have charged he was exceedingly wicked and vicious, indeed, in doing, and we would have talked in our grange societies of what we ought to do with Patten. Now, if the allied nations do exactly the same thing, no matter what their motives may be, you get the same result. What I am urging is that they did do that same thing and it did bring that result.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one moment. They purchased secretly, so secretly that no man can even to-day absolutely trace the purchases to them. The man whose statement I read to you told me in private conversation that he believed he had himself handled a lot of those orders, but they were not given in the name of the British Government or the French Government; they were given in the name of some dealer in Chicago or in New York, who sent to my informant's business house in Kansas City, and said, "Buy so much grain for our account." So that my informant does not now know with certainty that he handled grain for the allies, but he has good reason to believe he did.

I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in fairness to the allies, although the Senator has, of course, stated that he has no criticism to make of the allies for their purchase of this enormous quantity of wheat, it is to be recognized, of course, that Great Britain needed wheat, and that her markets for that wheat are ordinarily the United States, Argentina when Argentina has a good crop, and Australia. It will be recognized, too, that the distance from Liverpool in round figures, we will say, to Buenos Aires is some 8,000 miles, possibly to Australia nearly 8,000 miles, and to the United States 3,000 miles. To make the voyage you would have to have three ships sailing, for instance, to Australia from Liverpool to bring to Great Britain the same amount of wheat that one ship sailing to the United States would bring to Great Britain.

Great Britain being short of ships, there being an insufficient supply of cargo vessels to serve the country because of various reasons that we all know about without going into details, many of them having been sunk and many commandeered for the use of the navy, the merchant-ship tonnage being reduced in quantity nearly one-half, Great Britain was obliged to look to the nearest port for her supply of food. For that reason, among others, undoubtedly she sought this market. It was because she could take one ship and do the work which under ordinary conditions and at ordinary times she would have three ships to do, and she could not seek other markets when she is obliged to be confined to this market under present conditions.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator, but I have almost that exact statement in a memorandum here in the papers before me.

I am glad to have the Senator state the fact, and it is a fact. Australia is this year supposed to have a surplus of 185,284,000 bushels of wheat, but the trouble about getting it to England or to France is the length of the trip. It takes them three times as long to make that trip as it does to come here. It takes them one and one-half times as long to make the trip to Argentina, and the Argentine crop is poor, and ships are scarce and time is precious.

Mr. President, I have taken so much time that I have worried the Senate, and I want to get through with what I have to say.

Aside from this interference by the enormous purchases of the allies, there are other causes which I will come to a little later on, but that the purchases by the agents of the allies were a controlling cause I desire to evidence by quoting from market reports made contemporaneously with these rises. I am quoting from the market reports of Kansas City, which is one of the principal grain markets of the world. The Kansas City Star of May 6 had this statement in its market report:

Evidences developed last week that the English grain commissioners possess contracts in the Winnipeg market for more wheat than can readily be obtained there, and in consequence a highly strained condition prevails in that market, with the May and July deliveries so high that trading in them was stopped by the exchange authorities, and arrangements started for settling contracts on the basis of a fixed price where deliveries could not be made. * * * Last week's advances in Winnipeg prices put Canadian wheat too high to be shipped profitably to United States mills or markets.

So it appears the English bought in their own Canadian market and produced the same result there that they produced in our market.

The Kansas City Star of May 12, under the headline, "New wheat up 25 cents—Wild rush to buy for July and September delivery," said:

Traders evidently became possessed with a fear that representatives of European Governments have made large purchases of wheat for July and September delivery, and the same congested conditions are likely to develop in those months that have sent the May price above $3 a bushel. There was no other news to account for the wild flight in prices.

[From the Kansas City Star, May 13.]

The scramble for wheat—Last week's advances outdid any previous experience—Future markets appear to be tied up by large contracts held by exporters—Milling demands diminishing.

In the body of the article it is stated:

MILLERS AND EXPORTERS COMPETE.

It has been an altogether abnormal market throughout for two reasons: One, that the representatives of foreign Governments hold large contracts which sellers have found difficulty in filling, and the other that there suddenly developed an unprecedented domestic demand for flour due to the excessive purchases above current needs for household consumption all over the country.

The domestic demand referred to was the buying that suddenly started when the housewives got frightened and began their buying a barrel of flour apiece, which, as I stated the other day, happened here in Washington. I continue reading:

Millers say this demand is the chief reason why they have been able to pay the extraordinary prices for wheat to grind immediately.

In connection with the foregoing it is interesting to note that the same market report states what I shall now read. Now, notice this, you enemies of speculators—and I am no advocate of them. Let us see what their real attitude has been to this market:

Many speculators have been willing to sell wheat for future delivery at less than the current value of car lots, on the theory that wheat above $2 a bushel is so high that buyers would hesitate about paying the price, and the high price itself would operate as an obstacle to any additional rise, by checking the demand and curtailing consumption. The short sellers, however, found that in endeavoring to cover these contracts it was necessary to bid the market up higher than ever.

In other words, these great Governments, with their contracts for 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, can take that much if it is all delivered to them. They can, indeed, take that much more; they have unlimited money with which to buy. They also have an unlimited demand to supply; therefore they are absolute masters of the market. For once there was an actual corner. It could not be broken. It was a corner, not of speculators but of purchasers, who then employed their power to buy and also to sell, so as to keep control of the market.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Does it not require two parties to consummate and effectuate a bargain?

Mr. REED. No; not necessarily.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Are not both the buyer and the seller involved?

Mr. REED. Not necessarily. I may be speculating; I may want to corner the market, yet you may sell to me in perfect innocence, not knowing that I am trying to corner the market at all. You are a grain merchant. You buy and you sell. You know ordinarily that you can furnish me or anybody else with 10,000 bushels of wheat. I send you an order for 10,000 bushels of wheat. You accept it in good faith; but when you attempt to buy to fill my order you find I have slipped out and bought up all, or somebody else has bought up all, the grain there is; and accordingly you are found in a condition where you have to pay an excessive price or default in your contract.

I might be a speculator doing that with the wicked purpose of bulling the market, or I might be the representative of a great Government that actually needed three or four hundred million bushels of wheat. In either case if I used common business sense and judgment, I would have bought quietly in the name of other parties. Yet when you come to deliver the wheat you contracted for you find it quite as hard to get the wheat to fill your contract with the Government that controls the market as you would if you were dealing with a speculator who controlled the market.

I read further. The Kansas City Star of the 13th of May said:

Yesterday's sensational advance of 25 cents or more in the July and September deliveries reflects the opinions of many buyers that congestion and difficulty in filling contracts are likely to develop in these deliveries just as they did in the May contracts, owing to large purchases that representatives of foreign Governments are supposed to have made of those deliveries for future needs.

Mr. GORE. Portugal on that day placed an order for half a million bushels.

Mr. REED. I am informed by the Senator from Oklahoma that on the day the exchanges closed Portugal placed an order for half a million bushels, and that was one of the causes for their closing.

The third proposition I make as a contributing cause was the current rumor that the Agricultural Department had given out the statement that Europe would demand 100,000,000 bushels more of this year's crop of wheat from Canada and the United States. This rumor I understand to have been false. I am informed that the Agricultural Department, in fact, never gave out such a statement. I learned that, however, when I inquired from the Agricultural Department for their statement, and was surprised to find that the statement which was referred to in the press was according to the Agricultural Department never in fact issued. But the rumor had its effect. Witness the following from the market report:

The statement of David F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, that this country and Canada would be expected to provide yet 100,000,000 bushels of wheat from the old crop for export gave strength to the buying side.

May wheat opened here (Kansas City) 3½ cents higher at 318, advanced to 322, the new high level.

Mr. President, another contributing cause was Mr. Hoover's statement that flour may go to $20 and wheat to $5. I quote the opening paragraph of the article in the Kansas City Times of May 11, that is, of the Hoover interview which appears under the startling headline "Control or famine," and which serves as the newspaper's epitome of the Hoover article.

The opening paragraph of this article, which comes under a New York headline, which, I have no doubt, was sent out by the press reports and which is that part of the article which is always intended to outline the contents, the spirit of the article is as follows:

NEW YORK, May 10.

Herbert C. Hoover, who recently came from Europe to advise the Government on food conditions in Europe, says that without control we may see flour at $20 a barrel before the year is over.

In the body of the article Mr. Hoover is quoted as saying:

If * * * the whole world * * * is to have the unrestricted run of our markets in competition with each other and in competition with the speculator in this country, we may expect to see $5 wheat before the year is over.

I have only quoted a few lines out of it. It was that long interview of Mr. Hoover.

The effect of Mr. Hoover's interview is found in the market report of the next day, as follows:

Trade was limited in the wheat department yesterday but traders were wild in their movements at times, and prices again reached new high records. The famine talk of Herbert C. Hoover and the Government's urgent requests for conservation of food supplies started a buying rally that put values materially above the high records made Thursday.

Mr. President, add to these causes all the agitation that has been going on with reference to the liability of our country and of the world to starve, consider that one man's argument convinces another and he starts talking, and one editor's editorial convinces other editors, and they all start writing—add all these causes together and it is not at all remarkable that we have had an enormous rise in the price of wheat. I think we may summarize the causes for the rise in the price of wheat about as follows:

First. A world shortage actual of about 100,000,000 bushels, but a further shortage, which I call an embargo shortage, of from three to four hundred million bushels; that is, of wheat that is in Russia that can not be gotten to the market or wheat that is in Australia that it is very difficult to get to the market.

Second. Heavy purchases by the allies.

Third. General world inflation of currency and inflation in the United States caused by a great increase in gold.

Fourth. A general advance in all prices.

Fifth. Reports of the Agricultural Department of shortage of this year's crop.

Sixth. Rumors that the Agricultural Department has declared that Europe would demand 100,000,000 bushels of this year's crop.

Seventh. Mr. Hoover's statement of $5 wheat and $20 flour.

Eighth. Talk of a food dictator.

Ninth. Hoarding by housewives.

These latter causes constitute the governmental bull movement. Hoover has thus far been worth millions to the bulls. I do not say this in criticism or harshness of Mr. Hoover, but it is certain that we must expect high prices as long as Government officials, whether actually inducted into existing offices or actually filling offices that have not yet been created, from their high places announce to the people of the world that they are about to starve to death. The inevitable result is a rise in prices; it is unescapable.

In view of these facts, how foolish it is to undertake to cure the evil by closing the exchanges of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. In one moment. I think that wise men would do this. They would enact legislation for some kind of supervision. They would stop the gambling operations and allow legitimate business to go on. Instead of telling our people they are going to starve to death, making wild and extravagant statements of that sort, we had better tell the people that there will be stiff prices, that some economies are necessary, that waste should be stopped. Telling them there will be good prices will encourage every farmer to plant; but do not tell them stories that will lead all the people to believe that it is a case where only those who are strong enough to grab at the present time will be able to eat at the end of the year. In other words, we ought to use a little calm and deliberate thought at this time. The world is not going to starve to death. At least, we are not going to starve to death on this side of the ocean. If we had no wheat at all we would not starve to death. So long as we had potatoes and corn we would not starve, and I am not sure that we would suffer enormously. What I am appealing for here is that we shall not adopt quack remedies; that we shall not simply conclude that there is something wrong and therefore strike out blindly in the dark; that we shall not do those things that will produce the very evil against which we complain. Now I yield to the Senator from Illions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Missouri to look at a clipping from a well-known periodical which I hand him, to examine the illustration, and find out whether that would be likely to produce a bull movement in food products, and especially in wheat. The Senator has descriptive powers which I greatly admire.

Mr. REED (examining). Mr. President, only the superior genius of the Senator from Illinois could do the subject justice. But here is a cottage. At its door a pack of wolves with shining teeth, red tongues, and glaring eyes. At the window is a mother with her children, their faces gaunt with famine, their eyes filled with the agony of fear as they gaze at the wolves, who are about to break through and devour them—the wolves of hunger. What infinite rot! You complain if a man goes into the grain market and runs up the price of grain as a speculator, because you say he has increased the price to the consumer of flour, and you justly complain; but the speculator who has thus increased the price of flour to the consumer has done the consumer no greater injury than has the man who starts a false rumor or an exaggerated statement and who thus runs up the price of flour. Neither the speculator nor the blatherskite ought to be abroad in the land at a time like this.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any reports showing the quantities of wheat which were traded in upon the exchanges during those days in excess of the quantity available?

Mr. REED. No, I have not; but, Mr. President, if I had, it would not show anything. I do not pose here to be an expert on boards of trade; I do not undertake to defend transactions on boards of trade. I am not concerning myself with that; I am concerning myself to-day with the real causes of the rise in the price of grain. I am trying to convince the few Members of the Senate who are sitting here of the truth of the fact that false reasons have been assigned to a large extent; that there are great causes that lie at the very surface; and that we ought, in considering this question, to deal with facts and not with something outside the facts, and if we find the cause of anything injurious we may be able, with the application of a reasonable degree of diligence and intelligence, to avoid, at least in part, the evil.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I should prefer if the Senator would let me conclude what I was going to say with reference to his other remark.

I say this, however, that the amount of trading in a board of trade being in excess of the amount of grain there may be absolutely on hand that day may and may not mean anything. For instance, if one takes the aggregate of the deposits in the banks of the United States on any day, he will find that those deposits far exceed the total of all the money there is in the United States. Hence a man looking at the question superficially might say that the banks were padding their books; that they were accepting fictitious accounts, or that the whole banking system was rotten clear to the foundation; yet those deposits are honest deposits. I put my note in the bank for $10,000 and get a credit on the bank's books of $10,000. The bank adds that much money to its deposits, although it has, in fact, loaned it to me. That simple illustration will show how easy it is to multiply the deposits and make them greater than the volume of money. So, too, you may find that the aggregate of the sales of grain may be far in excess of the grain produced, yet this does not prove dishonest practices, for the same grain may be sold many times in the same month.

But, Mr. President, I disclaim any attempt to explain with any kind of accuracy board of trade transactions; I expressly disclaim any desire whatsoever to protest against any kind of legislation that will stop the illegitimate transactions of boards of trade; but I do appeal to the Senate not to start out with the idea that they can meet the evil which has grown up from certain conditions by making a Don Quixote sort of raid against something that is not the real cause of our present difficulty. It was simply with a view to arguing that one question that I arose, and I invite in all earnestness the attention of Senators to the table which I have prepared, which will be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks for I think an examination of it will show them how utterly fallacious many of the claims which we have been inclined to rely upon are.

Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. JONES of New Mexico addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED. I am ready to yield the floor, unless Senators desire to ask me questions.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I am prepared to yield the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well.

Mr. REED. Does either Senator desire to ask me a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I just heard the statement of the Senator from Missouri that he did not wish to be understood as being opposed to any regulation which would eliminate speculation on boards of trade. I feel exactly as the Senator does as to that, and I desire to do everything possible to eliminate it; but I should like to ask the Senator to state whether he believes that the grain of this country can be marketed unless there is an opportunity in exchanges to sell for future delivery against that grain from day to day as it is purchased?

Mr. REED. Well, speaking from my limited knowledge of the business, I do not think that the business of the country could be conducted without great interference, unless that privilege was given. I do not think that a man's buying grain for future delivery is a crime, or that selling it for future delivery is wrong. I do think, however, that when a man goes into the market, not as a good-faith buyer, but as one who is merely betting that the market will go up or that the market will go down, and places his bets in the form of purchases or sales, that that gentleman is an unhealthy individual to have around in times like these.

Mr. KELLOGG. I quite agree with the Senator; but I should like to ask him if he does not believe that can be reached by giving some one the power to censor trades or to close exchanges if such trades are not prohibited?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that might stop it; but when has it come in this country that the only way in which we can control matters is to give some individual arbitrary power? When has it happened that we can not pass laws that will reach evils? When did dictatorship fall into such fortunate times? How do we know when we get a dictator that he will act wisely; that he will not smash the business of the country; that he will not do more harm than would the speculator?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as suggesting that. I merely desired the Senator's opinion on that question, or whether it would be better to make the pure speculative deal a criminal offense?

Mr. REED. My idea is, sir, that this is a government of law and not a government of men, and that whoever substitutes the arbitrary will of an individual for the law of the land substitutes despotism for democracy; that he is an enemy of the Constitution and of human liberty, and that there is no wrong and no evil that is susceptible of control by human agencies that can not be met by laws enacted in the name of the people of the Republic.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. One moment. I asked the Senator the questions because those two plans are now before the Senate, and I wished to secure his opinion upon them, he having given this matter a great deal of thought. I think I understand the Senator's position.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] is a very pertinent one. I find myself in complete accord with the general principle announced by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that we must regulate by law and not by merely lodging arbitrary power in men. Most of our difficulties originate in that sort of government.

Mr. President, I can understand how executive officers may apply a law and advise those who may seek advice in the administration of the law, but how to administer unbridled discretion in a delegation of legislative power to a departmental head is a problem in government for which no satisfactory solution has yet been offered.

The Supreme Court, not many hundred feet from where we are sitting, not long ago, through one of its recently appointed members, Mr. Justice Clarke, of the State of Ohio, announced, in substance, the governmental principle that should apply, namely, that whenever it was possible to construe an enactment as a specific direction of law rather than so as to leave it to the discretion of some individual, the former interpretation should be adhered to; that there should be some positive rule of law, and not the mere will of somebody in whom might be lodged almost unlimited discretionary power. I have given as much time and thought as I am capable of to the question the Senator from Minnesota has mentioned. It seems to me that even in our legislation we might lay down as a sane rule one that I get rather from smaller jurisdictions, such as the States in which the grain exchanges are found.

Chicago is the largest single market for grains and provisions in the world. The largest single market for hard winter wheat I think is in the State of the Senator from Minnesota, that wheat producing a quality of flour which will stand shipment around the world and which will store and keep longer than any other like product of wheat devoted to bread-making purposes. In my own State, where the grain exchange in question exists, there are certain statutes governing it. The board of trade in Chicago exists by virtue of an act of 1859 incorporating it as a grain and provision exchange and defining its purposes, which are entirely lawful whether in the domain of the statutes of that State or of any of the acts of Congress. That act has been interpreted a great many times by the courts of that State, and in substance it amounts to this, if all of the decisions are collected and applied: That sales for future delivery, if bona fide, are not unlawful; that they fill a very necessary part of the grain trade of the world. The sales of futures in grain stand on no other or different basis than those of any other product of a merchantable character. Deliveries in future transactions depend entirely upon the intent of the buyer and the seller, upon the intent of one or both, and if a violation of the statute is involved there may be a joint crime or otherwise, as the case may be. For a person merely to make a contract to deliver, having no present intention to deliver the article so sold, it becomes a mere wager on the market; it is a gambling transaction, and especially if that intent be participated in by the purchaser. Ordinarily both are concerned, but it does not necessarily require both.

If one should have the intent never to receive when he buys or the other never to deliver when he sells, or, jointly, that neither of them has the intention either to deliver or receive what is bought or sold, it becomes criminal under the statutes of the State under which the board of trade is created.

The same principle, I think, can be applied outside of the State and applied practically in a regulation made by Congress. If the transaction is one which does not affect commerce between the States or with a foreign country, it is one to be punished only under the legislation of the State. Most of the States have such criminal laws. Such contracts under State law when made are not susceptible of enforcement. They are not only made subject to penal liability but the person who is sought to be bound by the contract can not be held to the performance of the obligation. He can escape liability in any court or cause as to any offer, sale, or indemnity, or as to any movement contemplated that is not intended to be a bona fide transaction. If it is entirely a buyer-and-seller transaction within the State, within the limits of Minnesota or New York, for instance, it is one to be punished by the enactments of the legislature, either the future one to be covered by law to be enacted hereafter or the present transaction to be measured as to its penal liability by the present statute.

I see no reason why Congress could not enlarge, under its power to regulate commerce, the offense. If it be a transaction to buy or sell in a manner that affects trade from one State to another or with foreign countries thus coming within the interstate commerce power of Congress, then, in my judgment, Congress has a right to regulate and to declare a sale for future delivery with no bona fide intention of delivering the article, if the transaction concerns itself with interstate commerce, either as to the ultimate delivery of the article or because of the residence of the vendor and vendee, a penal offense and to provide that all persons engaging in such a contract shall not only be punished but anyone who seeks to escape from the obligation of such a contract may do so. In that event no mere wager or gambling contract on the grain exchange could be enforced in the courts or could be collected any more than any other gambling debt.

This would not break up the grain exchange. It would penalize the unlawful transaction, the betting upon the market, which is a mere wager contract to be settled at a designated time by paying the difference between the price of the grain to-day and its price some time in the future. That is a gambling transaction. No actual grain is in the possession of either party; no actual grain is intended to be delivered; it is a mere bet upon the future, and the transaction is settled by taking the difference one way or the other, either the buyer or the seller receiving the profit or paying the loss as the case may be. There is no excuse for transactions of that character. I have no more apology to make for a grain gambler than I have for any other kind of gambler, but I do not believe that gambling in grain can be entirely prevented so long as there exists the gambling instinct and there is a bushel of grain surplus in the world to pass from seller to buyer.

The grain exchange has nothing to do with it. Gambling in horses will never be prevented so long as there is in the world a horse with any degree of speed on whose speed a difference of opinion arises between two persons of sporting proclivities; but I would not destroy the horse because that is so. I can go out on the market and, at least before the new revenue bill becomes operative, for 10 cents I can buy a pack of cards, and with them I can gamble to a most dangerous degree without going out of the city limits of Washington. Although gambling is prohibited here, I can win or lose a hundred thousand dollars before the sun rises to-morrow morning. Of course, the price of the chips would be high. I do not, however, play in that kind of a game. I would not, however, Mr. President, prohibit the manufacture of playing cards for legitimate, harmless purposes. About my only diversion with cards is solitaire. In that game one has an honest competitor. The greatest indictment I ever heard of a man in a public address in the stress of a campaign was that he could not be trusted to play a game of solitaire by himself without cheating. I would destroy neither horses nor cards nor dice, although among our colored friends dice are supposed to lend themselves to some abuse. Those who indulge in dice throwing, I understand, have imaginary combinations and dream books by which they hope to acquire large fortunes, much greater than those acquired by the gentlemen on the boards of trade who are criticized here. They seldom are successful, but the fact shows the vagaries of the human mind on any question of hazard.

A bushel of grain can be made the subject of a gambling transaction, and it will be so made just so long as can be found such men as we are thinking about; but the grain exchange has nothing to do with that, except that it furnishes a convenient place. The higher class hotels on this continent furnish rooms which are convenient places for gentlemen to undertake to play draw poker; but would you burn down all the hotels and prohibit anybody from going into them unless he has a certificate of moral character and a doctor of divinity with him as a guarantee that he will not abuse the hospitality of the inn? That would be just as sensible as closing or destroying the boards of trade; and if these transactions are prohibited, either by excessive taxes on sales for future delivery or by any other form of taxation, or penalized, you had just as well level the building, because it is of no consequence unless the business for which it is erected can be carried on.

I have in mind a number of commercial transactions that have given me more or less concern in the last 12 months. In the Mississippi Valley there are a number of large milling companies. Some are across the river, at St. Louis, in the State of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]—some three or four, but especially two that I have in mind. On my own side of the river there are many mills which are constantly engaged, and have been for many years, in milling wheat into flour for the export trade. With present war conditions and the inability of some of the ordinary wheat markets to supply the wants of the belligerents, naturally our own market became a resort for purchasers.

I heard the comment a while ago that men often sold wheat when they did not have a bushel of wheat to their names, and that is so. So do millers often sell flour when they have not a bushel of wheat to their names nor a barrel of flour to fill the contract. That is done habitually. It is the only way in which business can be transacted. Building contractors agree to erect buildings when they have not a ton of steel or foot of stone or bag of cement to their names. But that is no reason for destroying the flouring mill or dissolving the company or abolishing the contractor, any more than in the case of the board of trade or grain exchange, whatever name it may carry.

I have in mind a milling company in my own jurisdiction, situated at Alton, Ill.—the Sparks Milling Co. It has been in business a great many years, and the third generation is now beginning to handle flour and manage the business of the company that the grandfather of the family established. I have known all of those generations. It is an old and honorable concern. It built up from small beginnings, and, with the development of the market and the possibilities of our country, it kept pace with the demands of the trade. This milling company, as well as a very large milling company in Chicago and some across the river in St. Louis, have been furnishing flour to the allies on contract. Here are actual transactions, not mere theoretical ones, and if some of the regulations here sought to be made should finally pass into the form of laws they would not only hamper but actually, under present conditions, prevent a milling company from making or filling a contract of the kind I have described.

The sum of over $1,200,000 was involved in a single contract for the sale of flour by a certain company in the Mississippi Valley. At the time they made it they had not enough wheat in sight, under contract or in their warehouse, to fill 25 per cent of the contract. If they had sold in milled form every bushel of wheat they held in their warehouses or that they had contracts to deliver to them, it would not have exceeded $300,000; but they contracted to deliver in New York City $1,200,000 worth of flour within a stipulated time. For the other $900,000, the only reasonable way that a business man would figure to fill it would be to go out on the market, in the grain exchanges, and buy. They did so, and seasonably they bought, from time to time, enough wheat to fill the remaining part of the contract. When it was not bought outright for future delivery, an option was bought to deliver on a day certain at the then market price. The flour was not all to be delivered in New York at one time; but at stated intervals, as the shipping tonnage made it practicable, to be delivered there for export.

The miller went out on the market to buy the remaining quantity of wheat to fill the contract. Here to me is the material part of this regulation: How would a person buy wheat in that quantity to fill a contract with variable deliveries, at different times, unless he bought for the future? That is what they did. They bought futures. It was a bona fide future. It was not a gambling transaction. It was based upon an actual commercial condition and a valid contract entered into for the receipt of the flour at the times and in the quantities stipulated in the contract.

Where did they go? To a farmer who had a thousand bushels of surplus wheat in the bin? Did they go to a local grain elevator? That would be impracticable under present conditions. They went where every miller goes who does a general commercial milling business, and especially if he does an export trade. They went into the grain exchanges in St. Louis and in Chicago, into the wheat pit in the board of trade. Now, that is not a place where bulls and bears are horning each other, where gamblers with check suits on and with large buttons on their clothes and flashy jewelry are making themselves much in evidence. It is filled with business men, millers, exporters, brokers, and others in lawful business.

Let me give you an illustration as I go into the wheat pit with the buyer for one of these mills. We enter where the samples are and where those who handle wheat congregate. This is a miller, not a speculator, buying for future delivery; not to bet on the market, but for an actual transaction. He went into the Chicago Board of Trade trade pit and asked a commission man what he could furnish him a given quantity of wheat for, to be delivered at any time in a given month, and got his reply, and closed the contract for 100,000 bushels of wheat. That is not a gambling transaction. The miller, undertaking to deliver to the allies in the quantities and at the times named, went to the Board of Trade as a legitimate place for a legitimate transaction. How else would he do?

Suppose he had no such facilities furnished in a civilized government, in a form of society where these customs have been built up by the years. It would have been practically impossible for the milling company to have bought the grain from the producer or from the warehouseman. One warehouseman may have 5,000 or 10,000 bushels that is loose on the market, open to a contract. Another may have more or less. A farmer may have 500 or 5,000 bushels. Farmers are not organized. Their names are not listed, their post-office addresses are not known with the lines of transportation over which they ship and the quantity of surplus grain they have. They sell to the local elevator. In turn, that is transmitted, in due time, to the central distributing point, and the central distributing point is where the miller goes to buy grain. It is where the buyer of the Sparks Milling Co., in Alton, Ill., or the great Pillsbury, Washburn, and other mills in the State of the Senator from Minnesota, or where Mr. Eckert, of the Eckert Milling Co., of Chicago, goes to buy, or the Valier Milling Co. and others in St. Louis do when they hold a large contract. They do not go out among the producers. That would be an interminable task. It would be an impossible method of transacting business. On the contrary, they must go to the grain exchanges. There are represented the buyers and sellers of the whole wheat-producing area of the country.

It is, I believe, true there is some gambling there. I think I know some gentlemen who habitually gamble on grain. I wish to state, as a general summarizing now of the situation on the board of trade, that outside of flurries when men are trying to recover themselves, in the general normal condition of the board of trade in Chicago the great majority of the transactions are legitimate and have in them no taint of gambling. I know that statement will be questioned, but I believe that in normal times at least 90 per cent—likely more—of all the transactions in grain in the city of Chicago on the board of trade are legitimate transactions, based upon actual sales, in which the grain or the product of the grain is to be actually delivered and used afterwards for commercial purposes. This per cent equals the average of guests who go to a reputable hotel for proper purposes.

As these millers have no other way by which they can go out and acquire enough grain or contracts for enough grain to fill their orders, they must so buy for their own purposes. I have heard a great deal of criticism here to the effect that in a board of trade or a grain exchange there is vastly more grain sold than is produced in the country, and that is directly connected with the milling business. This is what is done by the same mills for which I have gotten letters of assurance many times from the British legation here before they could go unvexed across the Atlantic and land at a port of the allies and deliver merchandise intended to make hard-tack for their own soldiers.

A man requiring a future delivery of $900,000 worth of flour must go out and buy a considerable quantity of wheat; so he buys 275,000 or 300,000 bushels of wheat seasonably to be delivered to fill the order. He buys at a given price or buys an option to call for a given quantity on a time certain at the then market price. He has no assurance if he buys an option that the price will remain the same, although he delivers at his port city to the allies' agent a given quantity of flour every 10 days, and the price at which he buys the wheat on his option out of which he mills the flour may go up or down from the contract price. The miller has one way of protecting himself, and one way only. I think it is perfectly legitimate, although it adds to the apparent volume of sales on the grain exchange. He can not get an insurance policy. No combination of men has ever been found willing to carry a hazard that grain will remain at a certain price for 30 days, and especially wheat, in the nervous movements of wheat since the Russian wheat fields have been shut up and navigation uncertain.

Just as soon as he buys an option on 300,000 bushels of wheat, he goes out on the market and sells 300,000 bushels for the same delivery, the same kind of an option to deliver at the intervals named and in the qualities named, so that whether the market goes up or down, he has complete protection. Among the trade this is technically known as hedging and is a perfectly legitimate transaction. It is not a "wash sale" at all, as it is in handling stocks, so as to give an apparent strength to the market when in fact no such bona fide transaction exists. It is for the purpose of protecting him by a form of transaction that takes the place of an insurance policy and covers him against any possible hazard in the fluctuations of the market. This is a legitimate transaction, and it is the only way in which, taking it for future delivery or in the protection of himself, a miller who is handling the quantity that he is, and under bond at the same time, can protect himself and guarantee that his future deliveries will be made.

The board of trade, when its annual report is made up on its tradings for that year, will show not alone that 300,000 bushels of wheat was bought from a certain milling company, but it will show a transaction of 600,000 bushels, and that is one deal only. What I say of one mill is true of every mill. What I say of one man is true of every man, buyer and seller, especially the buyer. But a seller can hedge just the same as the buyer can. He can go out, and, by reversing the transaction, he can protect himself against any possible loss. Now, that looks like gambling on the face of it. As a matter of fact, it is as far from gambling as the sale of 40 head of steers.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that every large buyer of grain must sell daily in the market for future delivery in order to protect himself?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly he must.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, one other question. Suppose he is an exporter of grain, and he buys to-day in Chicago or Duluth 1,000,000 bushels for export, and he has not yet sold it; and suppose he sells for 30 days' delivery on the Chicago Board of Trade to protect himself. That is a legitimate transaction. At the end of the 30 days he has not made a sale to a foreign buyer, and he buys in his 30 days and sells again. As a matter of fact, he has made two sales of 1,000,000 bushels, has he not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is not that a perfectly legitimate hedge or sale of actual grain on hand for the protection of the merchant?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so.

Mr. KELLOGG. But is not that one of the means by which the sales of the country in the exchanges seem so large?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact, however, that along with these sales in the board of trade there are more or less purely speculative trades?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. So will the Senator give us his opinion as to how he is to eliminate the speculative trades which we believe to be injurious without destroying the legitimate trades?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I shall be glad to talk about that, so far as I am able. It is a material inquiry here, because the Senate is facing the question of regulating these affairs and preventing the illegitimate transactions so far as human laws can do so without destroying or impairing the powerful machinery which brings buyer and seller together in large transactions.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator does not believe that the illegitimate or the speculative trades are a benefit to commerce?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. They are a distinct menace, and no more beneficial to legitimate transactions such as I have described about the mills or the brokers who come together for purposes of actually buying and selling than a bookmaker benefits a pedigreed horse. Everybody is in favor of legislating and usually votes for State legislatures to "get" the bookmakers, because it is recognized that they are not lovers of blooded horses. It is only the results that come out of controversies over the respective speeds of different animals that they are concerned in. The question is how to eliminate the bookmaker on the board of trade, and leave the legitimate dealer free to follow the ebb and flow of the natural demand for grain that comes into the pit for buying and selling, so that it may ultimately reach the purposes intended.

The difficulty is, always in every case of which I have any knowledge in the State or Federal jurisdictions of the grain-producing country, to prove the intent of the vendor and vendee. In the transaction which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] put, which is a fitting illustration, and which is legitimate in character, there would be drawn in its train a host of larger or smaller men who are purely speculative in their intent and in their transactions. They grow to have almost uncanny knowledge of movements of this kind. What would be a mere chip floating along on the current of the market to me or to you would indicate to those men with unerring certainty that somebody had loaded up too strongly on wheat, and that the "long" was seeking some place to unload, or vice versa. Following on the heels of that transaction—which might involve one or two million bushels of wheat, which might start out originally with a smaller quantity of wheat, but before it ended it might run into millions, following the illustration of the figure given by the Senator from Minnesota—hanging on the skirt of that legitimate transaction, and following it along with the rise and fall of the market, there would be a percentage of speculators taking advantage of it either to sell short, if they suspected a long movement, or vice versa, and out of that hope on the end of the market to reap an illegitimate profit out of a legitimate condition. Still, in the public mind, it is almost impossible to segregate the lawful purpose from the unlawful purpose. Herein is the difficulty of sane legislation and not prejudiced destruction.

It is not entirely a matter that defies solution, because under cross-examination, which sometimes is of great value, if a person is a witness and is asked if he is carrying a million bushels of wheat for June, and is asked what purchasers he had in view, if he had none, if he bought entirely on the market with the expectation of selling, still it is legitimate; but if in the transaction before the June market is over he sold to somebody the option to put so much of his wheat, all of it or a part of it, and it turns out that the person to whom he gave the option was not a dealer; that they afterwards settle on the difference in the market; that he did not deal in wheat; that he never sold any of it to any miller or to anybody for any actual use; and his books show nothing but a change in money and a settlement on the differences between the one time and the other, and a thousand things that can be brought out in every transaction, you can find some evidence, although it is sometimes a very difficult thing as to whether it is a legitimate or an illegitimate transaction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator, for information, whether it is not the practice to settle these very hedges of which the Senator speaks in exactly that way? Are not all of the hedges settled by the difference on the market between what the wheat was bought in or sold for, or vice versa?

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. In other words, a man is purchasing and selling to-day in a future market, and he buys against it in order to protect himself, and he waits until that time. If wheat goes down or wheat goes up, is not the difference settled in exactly the same way as though it were a gambling transaction?

Mr. SHERMAN. No. Sometimes it is, but that is not necessarily the uniform course of dealing among legitimate dealers. It may be settled by setting off against or transferring the trades to others and balancing accounts. Among mere speculators on the market it is a mere wager or gamble and never intended to be anything else.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. FALL. If a miller buys 300,000 bushels of wheat, expecting to mill it, and it is a legitimate transaction, the wheat to be delivered, we will say, between May and July at his mill in Chicago, he buys that wheat at a certain price and becomes obligated to pay a certain amount for it. Now, when he sells the wheat to hedge, as the Senator says, to protect himself, does he ever expect to deliver the wheat that he has sold?

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. FALL. Then that is a gambling proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it is not a gambling proposition.

Mr. FALL. But he expects delivery on the one hand and does not expect to deliver on the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. He expects to stand one off against the other either in that transaction or by transferring trades to others.

Mr. FALL. But that is by closing a transaction on the margin market in the one instance where he closes it at the mill market in the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. It may be called, I suppose, by strict moralists, in one sense a gambling transaction, in that there is an element of chance, but it is entered into by the miller, not for the purpose of making money, but for the purpose of protecting himself. I know of no prosecution on a hedging contract of that kind under any of the laws I have investigated where a miller who actually worked with grain was ever held to be a gambler because he went out and reversed the transaction.

Mr. FALL. No; but I am asking for information. I am just trying to get at the effect of the Senator's argument.

Mr. SHERMAN. In a sense it is taking a chance to balance another chance. He is gambling with himself.

Mr. FALL. Now, in the instance the Senator mentions his miller comes on here and contracts with a foreign government for the sale of $900,000 worth of flour. He goes and buys the wheat to convert into the flour. He knows exactly what he is doing. He is selling his flour for future delivery at a certain given price, and he is buying his wheat for future delivery at a certain given price, and he knows what his profits are. Now, why should he be allowed to keep up the price of wheat? Because that would be the effect of his selling the same amount of wheat. It is just to steady the market, is it not? Why should he be allowed to go onto the market and sell for future delivery, which he never expects to make, the same amount of wheat exactly? He has gone into a legitimate business transaction in the first place.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FALL. The only possible purpose that I can see in his selling the same amount of wheat is to protect himself against a drop in wheat in the meantime. Then his purpose is to steady the market, to keep his wheat at that price, to prevent competitors in the meantime buying wheat more cheaply than he has bought it, and thus competing with him in the sale of flour.

Mr. SHERMAN. They could not compete, according to the Senator's statement, because there is a contract for a given price and a given quantity. It could not affect that transaction.

Mr. FALL. Precisely. Then, if he has made that contract, there is no necessity for his hedging, because he knew what his profit was going to be. If he has not made that contract, but was buying wheat to convert into flour to sell the flour on the market, then, you might say, it was necessary for him to hedge, but it would be against some competitor buying wheat more cheaply than he had and thus underselling him in the flour market.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right; I will get to that.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. Suppose a miller is selling his product all over the world, as he can, to actual purchasers. He has not contracted it in advance, but he is selling it from time to time. He knows that next July and August he is going to sell his product to somebody. It is necessary for him to buy 10,000,000 bushels of wheat for delivery in June, July, August, September, and October. He is afraid to run the risk of being bankrupted by a fall in the market price of 10 cents a bushel, perhaps. Is it not perfectly legitimate for him to sell for June, July, August, September, and October the same amount of wheat which he is going to manufacture, and when he actually delivers the flour buy in the wheat from day to day? He has the wheat there in his elevators and is insured a supply, and he has run no risk in the market.

Mr. FALL. I think the only effect and the intended effect of it is by equalizing the price, maintaining the price of wheat equally during the interim, to prevent a competitor purchasing wheat more cheaply than he does and selling the flour in competition with him. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that by virtue of having this wheat market or wheat pit, as it is called, it is true that by these sales backward and forward you are enabled to some extent to protect yourself—to hedge. The farmer engaged in raising other products, unless it is possibly cotton, is generally not so able to hedge.

For instance, a man can go into the cattle business, and he himself simply turns over a train load or a herd of cattle to market. It is impossible for him to protect himself by hedging of this character. He can not do it. These cattle are sold and practically delivered. It is very true that it may not be the case with their products. When cattle or hogs are converted into salt pork or pickled beef he can hedge against that going down, but the average business man in the United States has not the protection which would result from the establishment of gambling houses all over the country where a man might go in and hedge. If that were the case the housewife would hedge against the purchase of a barrel of potatoes. In other words, she orders a barrel of potatoes to-day from a grocer, and it might be very advantageous for her to sell through some broker her potatoes to be delivered the next month and equalize her price.

It might be best to consider that in connection with the food bill which is now being prepared, that we open the wheat pits, or grocery pits, or potato pits, or cabbage pits, or butter pits, or egg pits in every market all over the United States, so that everyone who makes a purchase may hedge. If I go to my tailor and order a suit of clothes for delivery 30 days from now it might be very well to enable me to protect myself by going to some broker and selling a suit of clothes for delivery on the same day, so that I would not lose anything by virtue of the price of clothing going down. It seems to me that that is all this argument about hedging in the sale of wheat amounts to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I will say in reference to the chief statement of the Senator from New Mexico that there would really not be a hedging transaction in that case where a miller buys a crop of wheat and stores it in a granary and sells the flour at a fixed price for future delivery. There is no hedging transaction in that because he knows where he is coming out. But suppose a miller in Minneapolis gets an order for 10,000 barrels of flour in May. He has not the storage capacity, and he has not the capital to carry the grain for so long a time. In that case he would buy wheat deliverable in May, and that would protect him and enable him to know exactly where he would come out. In his transaction with the flour the miller has his trade, his miller's profit, and could hedge against any gambler's profit or loss which might occur. Or if, on the other hand, the miller bought wheat expecting to sell the flour at the current price in the future and did not enter into a future contract for the delivery of flour at a fixed price, in that case when he bought spot wheat and stored it in his mill he could sell future wheat against it. Otherwise it might wreck any milling company in the country. I think in the case stated by the Senator from New Mexico, as I understood it, that would not have been a real hedging transaction.

Mr. FALL. I will say, if the Senator from Illinois will allow me, that I stated two cases, one in which flour is contracted for to a foreign government, for instance, an outright sale of flour. The miller not knowing what was being done, would purchase wheat at a certain amount and deliver flour at a certain given profit. In purchasing the wheat to convert it into flour he might sell that flour on the open market, but he hedges in most instances.

Mr. GORE. He would not hedge in the first instance, but he would hedge in the last.

Mr. FALL. Is not the selling of the flour in the first instance a gambling transaction pure and simple, if it is not a hedging proposition?

Mr. GORE. As I understand it, the grain crop is harvested in two months and the miller can not have the capital and has not the storage capacity to run his mill 10 or 12 months in the year. The millers have not the capital or the storage capacity to buy all the wheat in August, when it is harvested, and lay it aside or store it away for grinding in March, April, and May of the next year. It requires a good deal of capital to carry a mill over. It requires an enormous amount of cash.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator from Illinois will permit one more word, the whole argument resolves itself into this. Through the medium of transactions on the stock exchange a man in a certain line of business is able to protect himself whether by hedging or gambling sales, and the ordinary business men in the United States has no such facilities. He must take the ordinary risk of his trade. That is about the argument as I understand it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me state that a little differently. As I understand it, if a miller gets a contract to deliver 10,000 barrels of flour next May to the French Government he will require to make that flour approximately 45,000 bushels of wheat. He does not have the wheat at the time he makes the contract; he must buy it. Accordingly he goes into the market and buys 45,000 bushels of wheat for future delivery, to be delivered to him we will say in the months of March and April, when he is going to grind that wheat. Does the Senator think there is anything wrong in that?

Mr. FALL. When making a contract where he has not the wheat, but makes a contract for delivery of the flour?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Nothing at all. That is an ordinary transaction.

Mr. REED. Is there anything wrong for him to sell flour to be delivered in the future?

Mr. FALL. Certainly not.

Mr. REED. And sell when he has not got a barrel of flour?

Mr. FALL. Certainly not.

Mr. REED. It is all right for him to go into the open market and buy that wheat to be delivered to him at an appropriate time in the future?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; that is legitimate, for that is for the actual delivery of the wheat to enable him to fill his contract which, if he does not fulfill, he will be responsible for.

Mr. REED. Exactly. Now, suppose he buys this wheat. He is just a grain dealer, and he does not have any wheat, but he expects to go into the market and buy wheat. Is there anything wrong in that man selling him 45,000 bushels of wheat?

Mr. FALL. Not if he is a responsible party. I suppose that would be a legitimate transaction possibly.

Mr. REED. Suppose the man does make a contract with this miller to deliver him 45,000 bushels of wheat in the month of May at $1.10 a bushel. He does not know what the price of wheat is going to be. It may be $1.20; it may be $1.30; it may be so high that it will break him to carry the whole of the risk. He finds a man to whom he can sell 45,000 bushels at $1.12. Now, he has reduced his risk 2 cents a bushel. Is there anything wrong about that transaction?

Mr. FALL. Not in so far as he is concerned.

Mr. REED. Is there anything wrong on the part of the other man, who is a grain dealer, buying and selling?

Mr. FALL. It is, in my judgment, an entirely wrong theory of government to allow such a transaction to interfere with the food prices of the people of the United States.

Mr. REED. Now, the question is, Do they interfere with them? I am not talking about gamblers on the delivery and I am not talking about corners; I am talking about men who are really engaged in handling the grain, buying and selling grain, and making grain into flour and selling it. I call the Senator's attention to this. I am not in this matter in a controversial spirit at all.

Mr. FALL. Nor am I.

Mr. REED. My whole effort to-day has been to call attention to the fact that we are on the wrong trail as to the causes of most of the rise in prices of grain. Now, we talk about speculators; we talk about gamblers. I call the Senator's attention to this. If I actually go into the market and buy a million dollars' worth of wheat the fluctuations of the market may send that wheat up so that I may make 50 cents a bushel, in which event I would make $500,000 profit. It might send it down so that I could only get 50 cents a bushel, in which event I would lose half a million dollars. My gamble in that kind of a deal is $1,000,000. That is the chance, that is the hazard I have undergone. Yet everybody says that is a legitimate transaction. Now, having bought a million bushels of wheat at a dollar a bushel I sell a million bushels of wheat at 90 cents a bushel. My gamble is now reduced to a thousand dollars. So, instead of being a hedge of that kind, instead of being in the nature of a gambling operation, it is in the nature of reducing the gambling chance.

Mr. FALL. Yes; Mr. President, let me answer the Senator, it is in the nature of maintaining the ultimate price of the flour. I am presuming on the time of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all right.

Mr. FALL. The transaction which the Senator has just stated resolves itself down to terms like these: The miller engages in the legitimate production and sale of flour and will need in the ordinary course of his business delivered during, we will say, three months, so much wheat. He goes to a man who has not that wheat and agrees that he will buy the wheat from him, although the man does not pretend to have it and the miller knows that he has it not, but he knows the man will be responsible.

Mr. REED. He is a responsible dealer?

Mr. FALL. Yes. He then gets his responsible dealer to deliver that wheat at those prices, and at a profit. That is my statement of the case. The Senator disagrees, but if we would not disagree we would not have this little argument. This man who, according to my statement of the case, bet that he would be able to procure wheat and fulfill his delivery at a certain price then goes to the man who has wheat and buys it at that price. The miller having bought it originally from the man who had not the wheat, then bets another man that instead of being $1.10 it will be $1.12 for the same delivery exactly. He does not intend to deliver the wheat, he has no idea of delivering it, but he hedges legitimately, as some say, against his original purchase, so that his loss at the outside will be only 2 cents a bushel. He sells to some man who has no use for the wheat, who has no intention of using the wheat, but who is simply saying, "I will take that wheat at $1.12 and I will stand the loss if it is only $1.10 and I will reap the profit if it is $1.15."

Now, what is the total of the business? We started, we will say, with 100,000 bushels of wheat which the miller wants. He has bought 100,000 bushels from a man who did not have it. That man had bought another 100,000 bushels from a man who did have it. The miller sold 100,000 bushels to a man who did not want it and which he did not have or that he did not expect to deliver. That is 300,000 bushels, and the man to whom he sold it the chances are sold it to a dozen different others on a gamble or bet; and there are 400,000 bushels of wheat all involved in this one transaction of 100,000 bushels. You build up this artificial condition and each one is gambling on the purchase of the miller, which is a perfectly legitimate purchase, and it totals up in that way to 400,000 bushels of wheat. In the meantime, during the three months of the delivery, he goes on the wheat market and buys wheat at less than the others and undersells them on the flour market.

Mr. REED. Very well. Let us draw a conclusion. Let us see if the Senator is correct. Then does it not follow if that transaction tended to keep the price of flour up to the miller by keeping the price of wheat up to the miller it tended to keep the price of wheat up to the farmer?

Mr. FALL. It would if it was all a legitimate transaction, if the transaction embraced in this entire proposition was the delivery of 100,000 bushels of wheat; but here were 400,000 bushels, and one set of men are engaged whose entire interest is in raising the price of wheat above $1.12, or just as high as they can get it, and another whose entire interest is in decreasing it just as much below $1.10 as it is possible for them to do by any trade which they may negotiate on the market. You have people gambling in 300,000 bushels of wheat, and every one engaged in either putting up the price of wheat or in putting it down. That is the trouble.

Mr. REED. Now, let us stick right to that illustration. If they put the price up——

Mr. FALL. One side loses.

Mr. REED. If they put the price up, the farmer gets the benefit of that increase. I am talking now aside from corners. We are leaving those abnormal conditions out. We are all against them. If he puts the price down——

Mr. FALL. The farmer does not lose.

Mr. REED. No; the farmer does not lose in that event. If you put the price down, the farmer will lose, but the consumer will get some benefit.

Mr. FALL. If you put the price down, the consumer will get something, but the miller is using all his efforts to keep that price up.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. FALL. And reduce the price of wheat.

Mr. REED. You can not have both ends of this proposition. You can not eat this cake and have this cake.

Mr. FALL. Yes; you can.

Mr. REED. You can not argue that these transactions put up the price of grain and put up the price of products to the consumer unless you admit that it is a benefit to the farmer, because the figures indubitably show that the farmer's prices do go up when prices go up on boards of trade, and go up proportionately, except for corners.

Mr. FALL. I do not agree with the Senator's premise.

Mr. REED. Let me finish the statement. On the other hand, you can not say that the price went down to the farmer without also admitting that the price went down to the consumer.

Mr. FALL. I wish that statement was correct.

Mr. REED. I put in a table here made within a year which showed the value of flour followed the price of wheat up and down with the fluctuations in between.

Mr. FALL. From stock on hand.

Mr. REED. From stock on hand, and the unusual demand that comes from the European war. I am simply urging the Senator from New Mexico, I am urging all Senators as a matter of argument, as a matter of getting right on this question, not to jump at the wrong conclusion. There is an evil here to remedy.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me that the Senator's argument would be correct but for this fact: As a matter fact, by the time the speculative prices were reached in the last month or so three-fourths, yes, four-fifths of all the wheat had long ago passed out of the hands of the farmers, and they do not get any advantage of these speculative prices at all. Two weeks ago I met one of the leading grain men of Minneapolis. He is connected with the largest terminal elevator company there, and has, I think, 200 or more country elevators. I put the question to him: "Did not the farmers within your territory"—that means North and South Dakota and Minnesota—"last fall and during the early part of the winter, prior to April 1, market over three-fourths of their grain?" He said undoubtedly they did, and perhaps there is not more than one-fifth of last year's crop left with the farmers. I said further to him those farmers did not get on an average more than $1.50 for their wheat, and he admitted that was true. I said wheat to-day is three dollars and a quarter a bushel; who gets the profit? Where does the rake-off come? He undertook to go into a long story about hedging, by which somebody gets a profit, but it is not the farmer.

Mr. REED. Now, let me answer the Senator for just a moment. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I discussed that very question. I want to say to the Senator I have not the slightest interest in the boards of trade any more than my common interest as a citizen of the United States and a Member of this body in any business that is legitimate or if it is illegitimate then I have an enmity to it. I presented a table to show all these facts which will appear in the RECORD to-morrow morning—I think the reporter has it now; I wish I had it. When wheat reached the dollar mark in 1916 then it began to move rapidly from the farms. The only way we can trace that is the movement of wheat to centers from the primary markets. The primary markets contributed in one day something like 13,000,000 bushels, and wheat ran along between 8,000,000 and 13,000,000 bushels a day at those prices. Now, if that were sold by the farmer and in turn the price of flour for that period of time was in proportion to the price of wheat and the visible supply on hand had not increased, it shows that the wheat had been taken to the elevators and transmuted into flour. Following that along——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will just pardon me.

Mr. FALL. It was only there I wished to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. REED. Following that along, as the wheat continued to rise in price the sales continued to be large until we reach the period when the greater part of the wheat had been drawn in from the farms and there came an actual shortage in the country. The speculator, as he is called—or the big dealer, as he is called—did not have a large quantity; he had less than he ever had in his life when this high price came. So it is not the case of the speculator or the dealer getting a large quantity of wheat from the farmer at a low price, holding it, and running the price up two or three times and then unloading it. On the contrary, if the figures I have are correct, and I think they are, there is a constant stream of wheat from the country to the consumer, the same price being maintained right through, and as the wheat rose in price it went up to both the farmer and the consumer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me suggest relatively.

Mr. REED. Yes; relatively, certainly. I do not mean the identical price. There is always a profit, carrying charges, and those things.

Mr. NELSON. With the leave of the Senator from Illinois—and I am at his mercy——

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the April report of the Department of Agriculture issued as to the winter-wheat crop was discouraging. Based on that report, prices went up 40 or 50 cents a bushel. Then the May report came on, and, accompanied with the agitation in the press and among some of the Government officials that there was a great shortage in the country, they took occasion to raise it another 50 or 60 cents, until it got up to $3.25 a bushel. It seems to me that that information from the Agricultural Department was of no earthly value to the farmer, but was the means to the speculator by which to enhance the price. So I have come to the conclusion that these monthly reports of the Agricultural Department, instead of being a benefit to the farmers, are used by the speculators either to raise the price of wheat or to lower it.

The Senator spoke of actual shortage. That is a relative term. If compared with the crop we had the year before, it might be true that there was a shortage; but that there was a shortage in the sense that there was a scarcity and insufficiency for supplying the needs of the country, it was not at all true.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, to-day the crop reports from the Northwest are encouraging, and it has not been brought about by either Mr. Hoover or the Agricultural Department. I read here from the letter of one of the leading grain men of Minneapolis, at the head of a big elevator company. He states that—

> The crop prospects in the Northwest are splendid to-day. If they could go through to the harvest time, we ought to have 300,000,000 bushels or more of spring wheat. How to handle this is the problem that stares us in the face to-day. The consensus of opinion among the grain men here is that when the amount of winter and spring wheat is known by the Government they ought to export to the allies all of the surplus above the requirements of this country, the allies to purchase the grain through one agency. Then the grain exchanges can regulate their own members so as to prevent hysterical buying, and thus handle the crop on a fair basis both to the producer and consumer.

If the Senator will still allow me a moment, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the great object lesson we recently had in Chicago. Speculation got so violent on the grain exchange that it even shamed those fellows. Crazy as they are, most of them, for money and possessed of the spirit of mammon, as many of them are, yet it got to such an extent that they finally concluded to suspend the sales on the grain exchange, except to complete existing contracts.

Now, what was the result? Wheat immediately tumbled from 50 to 40 cents a bushel just by the closing of that exchange. To me that conveys this lesson, that the remedy for this speculation rests with the grain exchanges. If they were imbued with a Christian spirit, with a spirit of patriotism and loyalty, instead of infatuated with the almighty dollar, they would take this matter into their own hands and furnish the remedy, for there is the seat of the difficulty.

The New York Stock Exchange in 1914, when Europe was dumping millions and millions of her securities on the market, bringing everything down here, not only the price of their own securities but of similar kind held by our own people, what did the stock exchange do? They closed the stock exchange for a considerable period and that operated to give temporary relief in the case of prices going down.

To my mind, the relief in this grain proposition is to be found with the grain exchanges. They must either voluntarily do as they lately did at Chicago, or we must compel them to take that course.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when Christ found the money changers in the temple He did not do the Samson act and pull the temple down. He scourged the money changers out, and left the temple for legitimate purposes of worship.

Mr. NELSON. I hope you will do that.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I am in favor of doing; but not of destroying the temple itself.

Mr. NELSON. What does the Senator call "the temple"—the men who speculate in the temple or the building?

Mr. REED. It is the business.

Mr. SHERMAN. That depends on the mental attitude of the Senator. I am thinking about the agents of flesh and blood who buy and sell. As in the Scriptural simile, the temple was not the insensate stones out of which it was built, but it was those who habitually went into the temple. If they went for mercenary purposes they were properly subject to scourging, but if they went there for the purpose of worship they were exempt. If a person goes into a grain exchange for purposes of legitimate trade he ought to be exempt. The grain exchange is not of itself, nor are the people who congregate in and about the floor of the building, an evil institution. It may be perverted to evil.

The recent speculations in the wheat pit on the board of trade in Chicago were precipitated in the first instance by a condition for which the members of the board are not primarily responsible. It has done business since 1859. There are now more than 1,600 members who have seats on that grain exchange. I believe I am correct in saying that at least 95 out of 100 of them are legitimate dealers in grains and provisions, which are sold on the floor of that body. The remaining, say 5 per cent, probably, are simply scalping the market, taking the chances in the market and settling on those differences without any legitimate purpose of ever handling the merchandise in which the dealings are had.

I stated this afternoon to the Senator from Missouri, to illustrate the point that he was making—for it seemed applicable to the line of thought he was following then very forcibly—the conditions in the Chicago market when this bulge in the prices began. The allies have been buying grain in our markets for over two years, and especially in Chicago. There, by force of conditions, collect the buyers and the sellers for the greater part of this cereal product of the West and Northwest. For one product in the Senator's own State already alluded to—wheat—there is the largest market in the world; but second only to that in wheat transactions is this grain exchange in Chicago. The allies in six months had so, unwittingly on their part, conducted their buying as to be competitive in character. They had bought in the wheat market May wheat to the extent of 500,000 bushels. These trades were negotiated through commission men or brokers on the floor. They found in a little bit that the allies had contracts for the delivery of that much wheat in this month. This created a very great demand for May wheat.

The investigation naturally followed of what the visible supply of wheat in Chicago was actually by counting the bushels of wheat that could be delivered in Chicago, the supply then on hand. There were 150,000 bushels of wheat in the elevators, and there was more than three times that quantity of May wheat to be delivered. The natural result followed. If there was only 1 suit of clothes in Washington and there were 96 Senators that wanted a senatorial suit, there would be 95 Senators who would be bulls on the market, because none of us would want to go home in a barrel. That was exactly the condition in Chicago on the wheat market. Nobody thought that you could sell 500,000 bushels of May wheat with only 150,000 bushels of wheat in Chicago that was accessible.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator from Illinois would add at that point that it is pretty clearly shown that that shortage—the people who bought up the suit of clothes, to go back to the Senator's illustration—was caused by our friends, the allies.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. As I have said, they did it unwittingly.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. But, nevertheless, it is like any other accident. If an ax out in the timber in the days when we cut wood flew off the helve and struck some one, it hurt just as badly as if it had been done with felonious intent. So the effect of this transaction of the allies on the market was precisely the same. Immediately prices went up, and they went up rapidly. We saw the quotations. I followed them, and I saw that they went to unprecedented figures in a very short time. Everybody in the wheat pit went crazy, especially the "shorts"; the men who had contracts for future delivery, knowing nothing of this condition, found at once that they would be pinched out of the market unless something was done.

Selling short is not a crime. Everybody sells short sometimes. We sell short in the campaign every time we want to be elected. From some investigations I have been in some of the voters sold short for future delivery that was never performed when the returns from their precincts were in.

In this particular instance, with 150,000 bushels of visible wheat and 500,000 bushels sold, of course there was trouble. All the "shorts" ran to cover. Nobody could be "long" on wheat on that kind of a market until he could get relief from the outside. Then we went to the outside to get it, and what did we find? An order over here from the Council of Defense that prohibited anything but coal and iron and steel products from being moved. I saw a fellow the last time I was in Chicago going down State Street carrying a stepladder. It was early in the morning; the rush was not yet on; but he illustrated exactly what the Council of Defense is sometimes doing. Every once in awhile he forgot there were two ends to the ladder and punched the eye out of a man who was following along behind him. They put an interdict on freight by prohibiting anything except certain commodities from being carried, with the result that we could not get any wheat in Chicago. My neighbors there who are engaged in the legitimate business of selling cereals could not get a bushel of wheat. The price went up. That is the natural result.

I want to illustrate it by some of the reports that I have here. Immediately when this condition became known outside dealers in Omaha, Nebr., and out in southwest Kansas, Missouri, and Illinois—wherever there was any surplus wheat—began to rush to the elevators. The elevator men telephoned and urged the farmers that had a surplus in their bins to ship wheat into Chicago. They tried to get box cars for the wheat, but could not. So it was a combination, as the Senator from Missouri says, of the allies and the inability, by some prohibition on the freight trains, to get any wheat into Chicago to relieve this condition that made the trouble. It shows how a branch of Government which undertakes to regulate commerce can make more trouble than it prevents.

When that was found out the price of wheat jumped again. The farmers in Nebraska and elsewhere began to let loose their wheat just as fast as they could load the cars with any probability of their being delivered. Wheat began to rush into Chicago, but not in sufficient quantities to break this bulge in the market. That lasted for some days and, as the Senator from Minnesota says, in the closing of the grain exchange for a time; I think for two whole days there was not a deal made in the wheat pit. That does not argue that the grain exchange ought to be abolished any more than that the bank ought to be abolished because at times there is a run on the bank and it quits business.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I never intimated that the grain exchange ought to be abolished. I intimated that there were times when it ought to be regulated——

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I agree with the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Just as it was regulated for those two days.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then there is not any difference between the Senator and myself. I understand the Senator fully. The regulation would be proper. I think there are times when trading ought to stop.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to hear the Senator state how he would regulate the grain exchanges.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that some power ought to be vested in the directors of the exchanges themselves, who ought to be connected with the food-supply authorities here at this Capital. Under certain conditions similar to those referred to by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] trading must be suspended for a time. It ought not be done blindly or arbitrarily. The exchanges ought to be consulted at least in an advisory capacity by the Government before they are suspended in an emergency. Such suspensions will be temporary in most instances.

Some of the discussion on "hedging" was caused, likely, by my not making myself entirely clear. A miller who is under contract to deliver a given quantity of flour at a given time or at given intervals at a price certain can buy the whole amount of wheat he needs at once at an agreed price. In that case he is not required to hedge. He may, however, simply buy an offer or "indemnity," so called, which is a mere option sold him by a dealer to call on the latter for a given quantity of grain at any time in a certain month at the market price on the day it is called for. This option may never be used. What he pays for the option is then lost, of course. The option may all be used as occasion requires. The price in this form of contract varies from day to day on the market. Against this a miller may properly hedge.

A miller may buy for general milling purposes to supply the ordinary demands of domestic consumers. Such purchases are to fill no booked order, but merely to supply what is estimated will be the normal future consumption for a given time. He sells flour to the trade as may be ordered from time to time, at prices agreed on when the flour is purchased. A fairly stable price to the dealer is possible only when the miller can get wheat at an even price during the period when he is selling flour to the dealer. This is effected by the hedging process.

In the case of a large sale of flour at an agreed price for future delivery at an agreed time, as in the instance named, hedging would not be necessary. With this explanation I think the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and I will not seriously differ on this form of transaction.

I sincerely believe in the patriotism of the men who are at the head of large affairs in this country. I do not question their motives. Let me take as an illustration Mr. Patten, who has been mentioned. Mr. Patten began business as an oats dealer. I heard him on one occasion in a committee where the subject of futures was being investigated. At that time he dealt exclusively in oats. After giving some explanation of the way business was transacted in the oats pit, a farmer on the committee asked, "What is your business?" Mr. Patten replied, "I am a grain broker." The member said, "Be a little more specific. Are you not really a gambler in grain?" "Well," Mr. Patten replied, "you can call it that if you wish; but I am not as much of a gambler in grain as are you who raise the grain." Well, some one called on him to explain, and he did so. I can not undertake to go into details except to summarize. He said, "The farmer who raises the oats in which I deal takes infinitely more chances than I do. I know the oats-producing area of the world; I have agents or representatives to communicate with me by wire or cable as to prospects; I know the possible supply of oats, not only in this market but in every place where oats is a merchantable product; I keep track of it the year round. It is my business. The men who deal in this product know more about the oats market than anybody else. We do not gamble as much as the man who raises the oats. He owns the land, the horses, the agricultural implements, and the like, hires his help, puts his grain in the ground in season, and he has no more idea, save what is promised in Holy Writ of what he will have in the way of the advantages of nature than if he lived on another planet." And that is true. Whether he will get an oats crop or whether he will lose his work and the use of his land, or ever by his sowing raise a bushel is the most problematical thing in the world. The farmer by force of weather conditions is compelled to take greater chances in food products than the dealer; he can not help himself.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. Is there any way by which the oats farmer raising oats on his own land can hedge against the wind and weather?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. He can go to the all-wise Weather Bureau in Washington. The departments tell us everything; they tell us not to slaughter immature calves, and to ship nothing but coal, iron ore, steel products, and explosives to the allies. We can not get bread into our markets, but we can get bullets. That is governmental, but it is not natural. It is an artificial state of affairs under which we are living. The farmer is always working against or with the forces of nature, which are beyond human control.

But to resume that from which I was temporarily deflected, the oats dealer said, and proved his statement, that he took fewer chances than the farmer who raised the oats. Take him as an illustration. He has handled wheat on a very large scale since that time. I have known him for 30 years, and, as dealers go, in the parlance of the market, he is successful. His word is good. His finger up in the pit is just as good as a contract signed with a surety bond or cash back of it. He has said that he will not speculate in or sell for profit food products while the war continues. That is the point I started to illustrate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. I have a vague recollection that Patten once got up a corner in oats. Am I mistaken in that?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is not mistaken; no, sir. He is correct.

Mr. NELSON. At what time did Mr. Patten reform, and what brought about the reformation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Since the war began many men have said they will not try to make any money during the war. He has also made money in wheat. There are gentlemen residing in Washington—I do not know whether they are legal residents here or not—who during the recent bulge in wheat are reputed to have made $3,000,000 on the grain exchanges in Chicago and elsewhere. I remember a wheat corner several years ago in Chicago. Wheat was supposed to have accumulated in the hands of a few people, but during the time the corner was on and prices shot up to the blue sky the farmer, all the way from the State of the Senator from Minnesota down to the southwestern wheat fields of Kansas, emptied his bins and got the prevailing prices. At that time there was no freight car shortage, and every freight train that could carry wheat brought the grain from the wheat-producing sections. It was because of the great perfection of the transportation service that the bins of the producers were emptied of the wheat, and it was forwarded to Chicago literally by the hundreds of thousands of bushels. No man could corner all the wheat in the United States, and that is where this operator failed.

I do not want to stray off on any issues that are not particularly applicable to the point I started to make, namely, that the managers of large affairs can be trusted. Mr. Armour is the responsible head and owner of the packing house at Chicago that bears his name, founded by his father, Philip Armour, some years ago. Mr. Armour is not only experienced in the packing of meats and in the cattle market, but is an authority, as well, along banking and other lines. I know he is often singled out as a horrible example of what men ought not to be, to wit, successful, and it is said that he inherited a fortune from his father. Well, I have more respect for the man who inherits a fortune from his father and behaves himself and works and doubles or trebles it than I have for the man who had not anything when he started. We fellows who had nothing when we started had to work; it was not a virtue, but a necessity; we either had to work or starve. So for the man who started with a fortune and has taken care of it and used it and given employment to his fellow men I have as much respect as for the man who started with nothing and succeeded. Mr. Armour has stated that his packing plant is at the service of the Government, with no profit save to keep it in condition to be run to furnish food products for military and naval purposes. The other great packing houses will do the same thing. I do not know that they have publicly made the offer, but to me information has come of a reliable character that they will do exactly the same thing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. I should like to state to the Senator that I have a telegram from a number of the smaller packing companies—and while they are smaller than the great ones, they are very important institutions—making the same tender to the Government at any time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the Senator for adding that information, which I did not have at the time. In the cities of New York and Philadelphia, and all along the Atlantic coast, and in Cleveland, Chicago, and Kansas City, where I have some acquaintance, men of the very largest concerns in private life are to-day tendering their services without cost to the Government. The head of one of the largest State banks in my section of the country was in the city of Washington day before yesterday and tendered his services to the Government. In earlier life he was a civil engineer. I know men, locomotive engineers in their earlier days, who have become railroad superintendents or managing powers in the great shops of the continental systems, who to-day are tendering their services to the Government. The Government to-day, if it will properly organize the force through its War Department, can mobilize the greatest army of skilled laborers and of skilled men, from the executive departments of great industries down to the humblest machinist, that the world ever saw. What must be done is to use and not repel, arouse not chill, organize not disable, those great powers. I was concerned in securing passports day before yesterday for the last of 20 young men, from 23 to 25 years of age, who take passage to-morrow from a certain port on the Atlantic coast on the way to France, volunteers—ambulance drivers—going from a single city to undertake the most dangerous occupation there is at the front, more dangerous than service in the trench with the rifle. That is the spirit that manifests itself in the western country. We were not overly enthusiastic for war, but now that war has come, there will be no laggards there, whether among the members of the boards of trade, whose transactions run into millions in a year, or among the men looking out of locomotive cabs, or the man with the hammer or lever in his hand in a machine shop.

The idea that a grain exchange or board of trade—and I am not now referring to anything said by the Senator from Minnesota, whom I fully understand and with whom I concur—becomes a menace in times like this, to my way of thinking, is a great error. It has its evil influences, of a kind infinitesimally small in proportion, as I have indicated; but, on the other hand, in a time like this we need those agencies. The members of the board of trade know the possibilities of the grain and provision market in this country. From the packing houses will come our meat supplies, and not only that but incidental needful products and many things outside of the ordinary line of provisions. In addition to that we have the ability of the men who are gathered in the grain exchanges and who know the possibilities of the market. They know how to buy and sell and where to get commodities. I do not think that we ought in any manner to hamper the ability of these men for service in the coming crisis.

The allies on the Chicago market bought wheat unwisely and made the trouble to which I have referred. What ought to be done is to organize our purchasing ability and mobilize our supplies through the agency of boards of trade, prohibit speculation, prohibit transactions for undue profit in which the Government is engaged or anything which may interfere with the efforts of the Government to supply itself, but use their ability. When that is done we will have these agencies that already exist turned into powerful instruments for the collection and distribution of the food supplies that we must have. We ought not to destroy a single one of those agencies. I would regulate them; I would prohibit speculation; and I think we can devise here, either in the full committee, in subcommittee, or on the floor of the Senate—and there have been presented here some very good amendments to measures pending since the 2d day of April in my judgment—such amendments as will perfect a measure of this kind without interfering with the lawful and necessary functions of these boards, so that we may employ them during the war. If we do that we have gained something, whereas if we destroy those agencies we have lost material and necessary forces. Let us use them in such a way that we can avail ourselves of their power.

I want to stick to the text as near as I can and not take too much time; but I am moved to remark, as a Senator did on the floor here some days ago, that we have many commissions and boards and perambulating agencies that overlap and intertwine with each other, until we are likely to trip ourselves, like a giant in combat, and fall as the result of our own lack of agility in marshaling our resources.

I have spoken of the slaughter of immature calves. I had a letter from a friend of mine, which I thought was somewhat personal. He was a stockman living in a very important dairy section. He seemed to think that Congress needed the protection of such a bill. I indignantly repudiated the suggestion; but, aside from that, his argument was that if we prohibited the slaughter of immature calves we would prevent the production of calves. That is an illustration of how many of these agencies are moving here in a way to defeat the purposes they have in view. I will vote for such a bill as that whenever the all-wise Agricultural Department will give the stock raiser or the dairyman the power to determine the sex of the calf before it is born. Under no other condition can a dairy section safely have any additions to its herds. Make it a penal offense to slaughter a calf! Well, some of them have blooded stock. They have Holsteins, which is the prevailing dairy stock out in that country; they are registered, and their offspring are eligible to registry. Well, as nature arranges this thing, there is half-and-half. No dairyman, if he has a hundred Holstein cows which produce 50 gentlemen calves, wants to keep more than 1 of the 50. What he wants is 50 of the other kind. He wants the ladies, because to him they are the valuable ones all the time, not only in the dairy herd but the world over. That is an example of civilization. The more we take care of the female sex the higher we rise in the plane of intellectual and moral development. So on that argument a dairyman is the highest exponent of the art of live-stock cultivation. One of the 50 calves of the prohibited class will answer all purposes. You can not sell the other 49, because everybody around that country has all the blooded Holsteins he wants of that type. So, if he can not dispose of the 49 by selling them for veal, you will have to penalize the live-stock raiser. He will have to keep the male calf until he is a year old, as provided by one of these bills, which is called a food-conservation measure.

Mr. THOMAS. Two years.

Mr. SHERMAN. Two years. I thank the Senator. Well, that is worse yet. What will the calf do the first year? Nothing but consume milk. There are two ways in which to introduce milk into the healthy calf's system. The one is the way that all warm-blooded young mammals employ. The other is to feed out of a bucket. You all know, if you have lived on a farm, what a bucket-fed calf is. It soon assumes a rotund form in its abdominal region, like a Chicago alderman or a dirigible balloon, and it takes it to the end of the two years before it gets over the stuffing it has had because of the abnormal methods of feeding in the early part of its life.

So you punish the farmer in that way to begin with; or, if he slaughters it, you fine him $100 for the slaughtering of the calf or selling it to anybody to be slaughtered. It is not a merchantable article. That kind of live stock is a liability. The more of it a farmer has the poorer he is.

There is only one way to relieve him of that. If he sells it you have got to make the purchaser guarantee that he will keep it two years. That would be a real live market for live stock, with something of that kind attending the purchaser. That is the "conservation of food" principle that has been adopted here, and legislation of that kind has been urged. The only thing you will be finding as the result of that will be a shortage in dairy supplies. That is the natural effect of it, because with such limitations upon a man he will cease to breed cattle, and in from five to seven years the milk stock in the dairies of this country will exhaust themselves by the processes of nature and dairying will cease to be profitable or we will cease to have supplies. You can not cheat nature; neither can you cheat a farmer whose principal operations are in the processes of nature, and he will simply quit raising. You can not penalize him for that. You can not make a man raise calves.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; you can; draft him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Now, another thing in these processes: We have an order here, Order No. 1 from this Council of National Defense that I spoke about a while ago, interdicting freight except for coal and iron and iron products. It has stopped all the building in my country. We can not get any Portland cement. We can not get any crushed stone. We can get no sand, nothing used in concrete, in cement work, in road making, in bridge building, in office structures, in houses. All of it is held up and stopped, and hundreds of men are out on the street with the recourse of going to a recruiting station after the 5th day of June, finding that they have been conscripted, and getting into the Army if they are of the proper age; otherwise they will have to go and hunt a new form of occupation outside of what they have been following. These cement workers are feeling the effect of it. It seems to me that we are making haste here by destructive processes, and that in the end it will turn out that we have destroyed the very agencies and nullified the very means by which we might accomplish the results for which we all hope. Among them are some criticisms of the kind here on the grain exchanges.

I will join with any Senator here in putting forth, and to the best of my ability helping frame, anything that will regulate the abuses of the grain exchange; but I shall not vote for anything here that will prohibit the grain exchange from operating. If it be sought to tax them on future deliveries so excessively as to break up the grain exchange, it will accomplish the same purpose. The power of taxation can destroy anything. It is a lawful process by which every operation of the market, the field, the mine, and the forest might be stopped.

I have some amendments on which I desire to be heard later, but for the present, on this particular branch of the bill, following out the line followed by the Senator from Missouri, I have said all that is material.

I therefore yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments of the committee, which will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 1, to strike out lines 3 to 9, both inclusive, and, on page 2, to strike out lines 1 and 2, in the following words:

That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and carrying on the war with Germany by gathering authoritative information concerning the food supply, by increasing production, by preventing waste of the food supply, by regulating the distribution thereof, and by such other means and methods as are hereinafter provided, the powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are conferred and prescribed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, to strike out all of section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to take such measures, to use such means, and to employ such existing or additional agencies of the Department of Agriculture as he finds necessary to stimulate the production, to promote the conservation and utilization, and to facilitate the distribution of foods and feeds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 9, to strike out the words "SEC. 3."

The next amendment was, on page 2, lines 18 and 19, after the word "instructions," to strike out "to produce books, letters, papers, documents, or reports, or," and on line 22, after the word "neglect," to strike out "to produce such books, letters, papers, documents, or reports, or who shall refuse or willfully neglect," so as to make the paragraph read:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foods, food materials, feeds, seeds, fertilizers, agricultural implements and machinery, and any article required in connection with the production, distribution, or utilization of food. It shall be the duty of any person, when requested by the Secretary of Agriculture, or any agent acting under his instructions, to answer correctly, to the best of his knowledge, all questions necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this section. Any person who shall refuse or willfully neglect to answer any such question, or who shall willfully give answers that are false, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will ask to have that amendment passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 4, to change the number of the section from 4 to 2; on line 7, after the word "purchase," to strike out "grow or otherwise procure"; on line 8, after the word "them," to strike out "by sale or otherwise"; and on line 9, after the word "farmers," to strike out "on credit or other terms" and insert "for cash," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds suitable for the production of food or feed crops, he is authorized to purchase such seeds, to store them, and to furnish them to farmers for cash at cost, including the expense of packing and transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 11, after the word "transportation," to strike out down to and including line 9, on page 4, in the following words:

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal any such seeds to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture in such quantities, at such times, and at such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable. Upon failure of the person to comply with such requirement the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to requisition and take possession of such seeds and to pay for them at the price so determined. If the price so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid for such seeds on delivery the amount prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation for such seeds, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies.

Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with furnishing seeds to farmers under this section may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before we pass that feature of the bill I should like to address an inquiry to the chairman of the committee. To what end should we provide that the Secretary of Agriculture shall buy seed and sell it for cash? If the farmer is obliged to pay cash for it he might as well go out into the market and buy it.

Mr. GORE. I will say that some members of the committee made that argument before the committee, if I am at liberty to say so. There were two points made, however, in favor of this proposition, particularly by the Senator from North Dakota, who is a farmer. He said that often he might want seed, but he could not buy it in carload lots. He said that other individual farmers would want seed and were willing to pay cash for it, but they could not get it shipped in in small lots, except at a freight rate that would render it impossible; but he said that the Government, by having the power to buy the seed in carload lots and ship it into a community of that sort and sell it for cash, could meet that sort of a situation. There were Senators who were unwilling to start the policy of selling on credit, for many reasons which will, of course, suggest themselves to the Senator from Montana; but that was the point on which it turned.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before voting for the bill with this provision in it I should like to be advised of some necessity for our legislating upon this subject at all.

Some weeks ago a great many people in my section of the country entertained the view that the situation was of sufficient seriousness as that the Government ought to make an appropriation for the purpose of enabling farmers who were without means to secure seed to borrow enough from the Government to secure seed for the purpose of increasing their production, the amount to be repaid as soon as the crop was harvested. Fortunately, at least so far as my own State was concerned, the farmers and the banks are so situated as that they reached the conclusion, I think, that Government aid was not necessary or desirable. I was very glad to say to the committee that Montana would be able to finance its own farming operations; and I am glad to say that, although there is a prospect that the crop will be increased by from 25 to 50 per cent, we shall be able to finance it very nicely.

I can not quite understand, though, what the occasion is for the Government going into the business of buying seed and peddling out seed to farmers for cash. If any occasion of that kind has ever arisen, it must be in some section of the country with which I am to no extent familiar.

I can very readily understand, I will say to the Senator, that there might be seed coming from some distant country, something in the nature of a trial or a test, something that is not available in our markets which the Government might bring from a distant country, as, for instance, sugar-beet seed, or something of that character; but I have yet to learn of the occasion which gives rise to the suggestion of legislation of this character, and I hope that somebody more fully informed about the matter will be able to tell us what it is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this section as it was found in the original bill came from the department, practically. It was the view of the department that quite a substantial contribution might be made through the department to the stimulation of food production if certain very broad powers were given to the department. The committee did not favor going as far as the suggestion of the department went, but we were willing to concede that the department was able to learn of the localities where seeds could be procured, and also, through its various agencies, the localities in which seeds were scarce; and it was the opinion of the department that opportunity would probably be given to stimulate food production to a large extent if it was prepared, wherever the emergency arose, or wherever a larger supply of seeds could be used than were found in the locality, to place in the locality seeds in quantities meeting the demand of the locality.

We acceded to that view to the extent of furnishing a fund temporarily to buy seeds, but requiring that the department dispose of them for cash. Our view was that even though there might be a local shortage of seeds, even though the department might be able to contribute toward larger food production by placing seeds in considerable quantities in a particular locality, the farmers desiring to use them could always find local support and local credit with which to provide funds; and we were opposed to the Government going into the credit business in the disposition of any of these seeds.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. From reading this, I apprehend that it is to meet contingencies to arise in the future, and not for immediate use now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is a provision that is made in contemplation of the possible continuation of the war and to meet conditions in the various communities of the United States where they are not able to buy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or even during this summer or this fall.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, I say, in the future—not now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. This crop is all right.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the idea that was in the minds of the gentlemen who drafted the bill is quite evident from its language. As originally framed, the bill authorized the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds suitable for the production of food or food crops, to purchase, grow, or otherwise procure such seeds, to store them, and to furnish them, by sale or otherwise, to farmers, on credit or other terms. That was the idea that was in the mind of the farmer—the same idea that I suggested was agitated some time ago. The idea was to provide seeds to farmers upon credit; but that idea having been rejected by the committee, we must find some other reason and some other occasion for the provision as it would stand when the amendment is adopted.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I think the experience of the Senator from Montana and the experience of the State of Montana is largely responsible for dropping out the language which has been stricken out by the committee.

The Senator introduced a bill appropriating, I believe, $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed. There was an acute situation in his State. I did not agree with the Senator's theory when he introduced the bill. Afterwards he came before our committee and said that he did not care to insist on the passage of the bill and withdrew the request for it. It worked out as I anticipated it would, and as I think it ought to work out. The people themselves meet these situations.

I felt very reluctant to embark upon a policy of buying seed and selling it on credit. We have had a good deal of experience with irrigation plants, and I do not believe a great deal has ever been paid on those plants. I know that the Senators or the Congressmen from a State where seed was sold on credit would turn up at the next session asking either that the payments be postponed or that they be canceled. My own judgment is that free corn did more to enervate the energies and the virtues of the Roman people than any other one thing. It was felt, however, and on the insistence, I will say in his absence, of the Senator from North Dakota that possibly there might be situations where the farmers desired seed and could not purchase it in sufficient quantities to secure favorable freight rates; and we thought that to meet that limited situation it might not be amiss to bring back the provision that the bill now contains. I agree entirely with the Senator myself. The committee took a different view of it, and I deferred to their collective wisdom.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I add to that just the statement of the Secretary on this point before the committee? He says, on page 20 of volume 1 of the hearings:

> We could not go into the business of supplying seed wholesale, because it would involve too big an undertaking, but we could furnish some relief in restricted sections. We might assist communities which are in distress in securing seed at lower cost by securing them in larger quantities. Especially should we undertake to protect and safeguard our seed supply for next year.

So that another argument is that by buying in larger quantities the department could furnish them at cheaper rates, even for cash.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the matter is passed, in view of what has been said by the chairman of the committee, I feel that a further word from me is quite appropriate.

I went before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and called their attention to a state of affairs which was reported to exist in the State of Montana that presented a rather serious situation. As is well known, Montana is getting to be a very great producer of wheat. Winter wheat is the variety chiefly grown. It was cultivated with great success and on a very large scale, first, in what is known as the Judith Basin country. Information came of 400,000 acres of winter wheat in that country, of which at least 75 per cent was winterkilled. Although perhaps the original estimate was high, the fact remains that many thousands of acres of winter wheat in Montana have been winterkilled; and with that came the information that in order to meet the expectations of the country in the matter of an increased food supply, it would be desirable to seed a large portion of that area to spring wheat, and that many of the farmers had exhausted their resources in the seeding which they had done during the fall and late summer and were unable to provide themselves with the means to secure the seed for spring planting.

As a matter of fact, I did prepare a bill, as suggested by the Senator, after conference with the Secretary of Agriculture, the Farm Loan Board, and the Federal Reserve Board, looking to the appropriation of $5,000,000 to loan to farmers who desired to make use of the money for the purpose of procuring seed; but about that time I got information from the president of the farm-loan bank at Spokane, a distinguished banker of my own State, who advised very strongly against taking that course. About the same time I learned also that a very active, energetic, and concerted effort was being made by the State council of defense to meet the situation. They had enlisted the active aid and support of banks throughout the State to meet the situation locally. Advertisements were placed in the newspapers by many of the banks in the country districts offering to extend, to the limit of their resources, credit to any deserving farmer who might desire to get money for the purpose of financing his farming operations; and from other sources I got information that the situation was being measurably taken care of.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator right there with regard to that matter? I should like to ask, if I may be permitted, whether there has not been a large influx of money from the East into the State of Montana, which has had the effect of keeping the rates down to a point considerably lower than has been current there in the past?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think any considerable amount of money has come into the State of Montana from the East within the last two or three years, except such as was loaned on mortgage security. Our banks are carrying very high reserves. Their deposits have increased wonderfully. The bank deposits in my own city have doubled within the past three years, and all of the banks in the State are carrying very high reserves.

Mr. PAGE. Is it not true, Mr. President, that the rates on farm loans, and indeed on all loans, in Montana have been materially reduced within the last two years?

Mr. WALSH. That is quite true; and the reduction recently is assigned by those best informed to the enactment and institution of the Federal farm-loan system. The prospect of getting loans from the farm-loan bank at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent has naturally operated already to reduce materially the rates on loans made by private lenders.

Mr. PAGE. It is only a matter of justice to the chairman of our Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to state that he was opposed, as I understood him, to this entire section, and only consented with much reluctance to its passage as amended. It will be observed, in line 21 of page 5, that the immense sum of $6,500,000 was reduced to $2,500,000, and that practically all of the objectionable features with regard to furnishing seed have been eliminated by striking out very much the larger part of section 2, so that as it is now written there would seem to be no great danger, because it provides simply that the Secretary of Agriculture may, for cash, act as a sort of clearing house in aiding the farmers to procure their supply of seed wheat or other grain. But I think when the Senator speaks of the ability of Montana to take care of all the requirements of her farmers, he is simply stating what I know to be a fact through my connection with it.

Mr. WALSH. This leads me to believe that the condition which suggested the incorporation of this provision in the bill does not call for legislation of that character, and apparently the committee was of the same opinion. Unless I shall be more fully advised concerning the necessity for the legislation as it stands now in the bill I shall move to strike out that portion of it.

Mr. KELLOGG. May I ask the Senator from Montana a question? He refers simply to the appropriation of $2,500,000 for purchasing seed.

Mr. WALSH. No; the appropriation, I take it, follows as a consequence of the provision found in section 2, as it now stands, which authorizes the Secretary to purchase seed and sell it to farmers for cash.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is that provision the Senator from Montana, unless further advised, will move to strike out?

Mr. WALSH. I shall move to strike out the first part of section 2, and when that part goes out I assume there will be no occasion for the appropriation referred to further on in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the chairman if it was the intention of the committee that the seeds should be purchased for this year?

Mr. GORE. I do not think they were to be purchased for this year. Perhaps a few peas, beans, and potatoes might be purchased, but certainly not anything else of consequence.

Mr. SMOOT. I know of nothing that could be purchased of service at this late day from the Government of the United States. They would not have sufficient time to get the seeds into the soil. The Government could not purchase them and then ship them to any part of the country to be planted in time to raise any crop whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Some seed might be planted in the fall.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator from Utah is correct in the main. Of course the operation of the bill is made to terminate with the war.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think very much will come from the seed provision, and I believe it ought to go out.

Mr. GORE. I will say that under the provision there will be no ultimate loss of the expenditure on the part of the Government. What money it expends for seed it will get back from the purchasers of the seed. I do not think there would be any harm in permitting the provision to remain in the bill from the standpoint of the Treasury. So far as being a precedent is concerned, if there is objection to it on that ground, that is a different proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is a bad precedent to set. I do not believe in it as a principle. But there is this that could come from it, I will say to the Senator, and I consider that it would be a waste of money: The Secretary of Agriculture, if he saw fit, could send out a lot of men over the country to find first the price of seed, where it was located, and what we could purchase it for. That expense, of course, would be paid out of the appropriation, and it would be, in my opinion, a loss of money.

Mr. GORE. It would be a loss of money if that policy was pursued to that extent I will ask that this amendment be passed over. Possibly others will not require so much discussion, and we will revert to it when we complete the other amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is no objection to the amendment, I understand. The objection is to the amendment as proposed to be amended. I think the amendment can be adopted without opposition. That does not carry the remaining provision of the section.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. But if we agree to it we shall have to reconsider it.

Mr. GORE. We are merely agreeing to the amendment now, not to the section. We are considering only the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all.

Mr. SMOOT. And let the balance of it go?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will stand for consideration later. The committee has trimmed it substantially, and it is a question to be determined whether we ought to leave what the committee has left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 11, strike out after the word "transportation" the remainder of the bill down to and including the word "receipt," in line 9, page 4, in the following words:

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal any such seeds to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture in such quantities, at such times, and at such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable. Upon failure of the person to comply with such requirement the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to requisition and take possession of such seeds and to pay for them at the price so determined. If the price so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid for such seeds on delivery the amount prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation for such seeds, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies.

Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with furnishing seeds to farmers under this section may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask whether all the amendments in section 2, down to line 11 on page 3, have been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that everything has been agreed to now up to the middle of page 4, section 5 (3). On page 2, the amendments, in lines 18 and 19 and lines 22 and 24, were passed over at the request of the chairman. The Chair asks unanimous consent that the Secretary be authorized to change the numbering of the sections to conform with the action of the Senate. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 13, section 3, strike out the words "and to issue such orders," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with such State and local officials, and with such public and private agencies or persons as he finds necessary, and to make such rules and regulations as are necessary effectively to carry out the preceding section of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 2, section 5, to strike out the words "effort or funds," and insert "work," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the President is authorized to direct any agency or organization of the Government to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out the purposes of this act and to coordinate their activities so as to avoid any preventable loss or duplication of work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 12, section 7, after the word "stock," to insert the words "including hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle"; and, in line 16, to strike out "$2,010,000" and insert "$4,500,000," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That for the purposes of this act, the following sums are hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended: For the prevention, control, and eradication of the diseases and pests of live stock, including hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle; the enlargement of live-stock production; and the conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products, $4,500,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill what is the amount of appropriation for this identical purpose in the regular Agricultural appropriation bill for the current fiscal year.

Mr. GORE. I do not remember the different items. In relation to the cattle tick, it is something over $600,000, and in relation to hog cholera, I think the amount is $400,000.

Mr. THOMAS. What reason exists for this very large appropriation for these purposes?

Mr. GORE. I will say that it is in harmony with an effort to conserve our food supply. It is estimated that there is an annual loss to live stock in the United States from various diseases aggregating $250,000,000. A large part of this is for three of the four principal diseases. It is estimated that the average annual loss from hog cholera is something over $40,000,000. I do not have the figures for the other diseases in recent years, but the loss is enormous.

There is in the United States to-day a section under the dominion of the cattle tick as large in area as the German Empire, the French Republic, and the Kingdom of Italy. It is entirely practicable to exterminate the cattle tick in that vast region. That would contribute tremendously to the food supply of the Nation. It would serve every section of the country, for the breeders in the North may be shipped down South, which can not be done now, and the breeders produced in the South could be shipped to the North. Not only that, it would contribute in a substantial way to the live-stock supply and the food supply of the country.

From the marked success there is no question of the demonstrated possibility to exterminate cattle tick and rescue this territory from its ravages. In the demonstration in counties in the United States, some 14 in number, respecting hog cholera, the number of deaths from hog cholera has been reduced something like 350,000 head in those 14 counties; and it is believed that as we are expending so many millions for other purposes, $700,000,000 for ships to carry supplies to our friends and allies, we ought to have as much cargo as possible in those vessels; and not only that, we ought to maintain the supplies for our home consumption as well. I trust that in this emergency measure it will be not only of service during this war but it will be an eternal service to the people of this country.

I hope we can succeed in the passage of this measure, and in the extermination or at least in the arrest of these pests. I trust that the Senator will not object to the appropriation.

Mr. THOMAS. I take it that the war has produced a great many calamities, but it has not increased the prevalence of hog cholera or the extension of the plague of the cattle tick.

Mr. GORE. I have heard of no extension of these diseases among live stock as a consequence of the war.

Mr. THOMAS. I assume that when the committee having charge of the regular appropriation bill was considering that bill it gave full attention to that particular subject.

Mr. GORE. It did.

Mr. THOMAS. And an appropriation was made that was considered at the time to be adequate.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that in the appropriation act before the last one the committee reported a very substantial increase in the cattle-tick provision, which the Senate agreed to without any protest. Unfortunately, it went out in conference. Otherwise we would have been much better prepared than we now are. I am not certain whether the amendment I offered at the last session was retained. I was not present, as the Senator knows. For my own part, I have been proposing this for years in an effort to carry this conquest to the southern border of this country. There is no economy in delay even as a peace measure. I have always thought our delay was an extremely short-sighted policy, and this emergency demonstrates, I think, the foresight of that position.

Mr. THOMAS. If I thought this amount of money was necessary and that in the use of it these plagues could be exterminated, I would be the last man to oppose it.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator in this connection there is no doubt about the extermination of the tick. Of course, the hog cholera and the other diseases are not subject to such absolute control.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator know how many years we have been engaged in the extermination of the tick?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; we have been engaged, I believe, for 11 years in it and have wrested 290,000 square miles, an area as large as Austria-Hungary, from the sovereignty of the pest.

Mr. THOMAS. That shows very good work.

Mr. GORE. It does, but there is nearly twice that much still subject to the tick.

Mr. THOMAS. But I am not content that we should at this time add to the bill for our current expenses for this purpose the vast sum of four and one-half millions of dollars until we get some further information as to the adequacy of the regular appropriation. It is true that we have appropriated something like $700,000,000 for the purpose of constructing a merchant marine, an enormous sum of money, which largely increases the financial burdens of the American people, but it would seem to me that on the other hand the very fact that we have been called upon to make this extraordinary expenditure should suggest the need of some economy in some other direction, even to the extent of four and one-half million dollars.

Of course, millions now are not very important to the American Congress. We are dealing in billions, and we have got beyond that primative stage in which millions were of importance or of concern. I do not believe that these emergency measures, of which this is one, should be used as a vehicle for the transfer of any sums of money out of the National Treasury which properly belong in the regular appropriation bills relating to those subjects. For that reason I shall object—and my objection may, as usual, be entirely useless—to the incorporation in this measure of an appropriation like this. I do not think it ought to be done.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to state to the Senator from Colorado, before he makes up his mind to vote against the appropriation, I should be very glad to get from the Agricultural Department a statement showing just what has been accomplished in this line of work. I can speak with authority, so far as the State of Mississippi is concerned. A great many hundreds of thousands of dollars have been saved to the Government, and I think the entire State has at last succeeded in getting rid of the cattle tick. Nothing else contributed more to the prosperity of the people engaged in that line of industry than the extermination of this little pest. If the money is being judiciously expended, it is wise economy to use it in this way.

While I can not speak of the scope of the work in contemplation—and I can not say of my own knowledge that all the money has been prudently expended—I can say that the work under the direction of the National Government for the extermination of the cattle tick has been of immense benefit to the American people, and, I repeat, if wisely and judiciously expended it will bring a very large return upon the investment.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice that in the bill as originally introduced for the purpose we are now discussing the sum of $2,010,000 was appropriated, which the committee increased to $4,500,000. I wish to ask whether the Secretary of Agriculture asked for any such sum of money?

Mr. GORE. He did not.

Mr. THOMAS. Did he say anything about whether it was necessary?

Mr. GORE. I have discussed with him, from time to time, the progress of the extermination of the cattle tick, and he is very strongly in favor of prosecuting that policy. His last annual report bears very strong witness to that fact.

Mr. THOMAS. That does not answer my question.

Mr. GORE. Probably I amaze the Senator when I state the Secretary of Agriculture was not consulted by the committee as to whether we should make this appropriation for the extermination of the cattle tick and arrest the ravages of the other diseases. For once the committee acted on its own responsibility, and it must bear the blame if there be any blame attached.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think the committee is to be censured for following a course which it believed to be wise.

Mr. GORE. I may say the amount carried by the bill is not sufficient to complete the work.

Mr. THOMAS. I have been informed that the amount is more than the department can use at the present time.

Mr. GORE. It is impossible to answer that question, because it depends in some measure on the cooperation of local authorities. The amount is not sufficient to complete the work. I have an estimate from the department to the effect that to complete the eradication of the cattle tick alone will require between three and four million dollars. There was included in this appropriation not only the cattle tick but the hog cholera and another most virulent disease, which works great havoc among the live stock of the country. These are three of the four worst diseases, and it was the sense of the committee that we ought to prosecute this work.

Mr. THOMAS. If it be true that the amount is greater than the present needs of the department in the prosecution of this most important work, then it strikes me we ought not to make the appropriation.

Mr. GORE. I will say if the organization can not be completed to carry forward the work, of course the appropriation will lapse.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have always been and I am now in favor of liberal appropriations for the eradication of hog cholera, cattle tick, or any other of the diseases that afflict the live stock of this country. As I remember, in the last Agricultural appropriation bill we provided $400,000 for the eradication of hog cholera, and between six and seven hundred thousand dollars, as I remember, for the extermination of the cattle tick. The increase in this appropriation is so much that I do not believe it can possibly be used to advantage during the coming year.

Mr. GORE. I will state that it is not limited to the coming year. It runs for the war.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean for the coming fiscal year, which will run from July 1 of this year until June 30, 1918.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is mistaken. Of course this is not a regular appropriation bill, and it is not limited to the fiscal year. It runs for the period of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. You have limited it to the war?

Mr. GORE. To the period of the war. We begin the expenditure on the first of the fiscal year and it is subject to the close of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I see the provision is—

That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed, the date of which shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the date when this act shall cease to be in effect shall not be later than the beginning of the next fiscal year after the termination, as ascertained by the President, of the present war between the United States and Germany.

Of course we can not tell how long that may be. It may be for the next fiscal year or it may be two or three years after. But I think, Mr. President, it is a very wrong policy for us to appropriate great sums of money to carry it beyond the fiscal year 1918. The Finance Committee is compelled to take into consideration every dollar of appropriations made at this session of Congress and to impose taxes to meet the same.

I now desire to say that the imposition of the taxes which will be absolutely necessary is going to be very burdensome on the people of the United States. During the last few years there has been agitated——

Mr. GORE. If I may interrupt the Senator, I desire to say that I believe, notwithstanding the increase in this item, we reduce the total appropriation carried by the bill by some $3,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I noticed that.

Mr. GORE. I do not remember the exact amount.

Mr. SMOOT. But what I have to say is that this particular item——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think the Senate ought to have all the information. I have myself thought that this appropriation is too high and ought to be reduced, and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] was likewise of that opinion. I think the chairman of the committee has some information that may not be accessible in these hearings; but in the hearings the Secretary of Agriculture stated, when asked about this matter, that the Bureau of Animal Industry had given him an estimate for increasing meat production of $4,000,000. That included everything. Then he stated:

Only $400,000 of this sum is suggested for the eradication of the cattle tick. There are a number of difficulties in the way of large increased expenditures. Some of the communities are not prepared to cooperate more effectively. Then, again, it is necessary to consider the follow-up work.

But I was constrained to follow the chairman of the committee, who, I believe, had some even more definite information and some later information. He has since stated to me that this sum was necessary, and the Secretary himself said that $400,000 was for the eradication of the cattle tick.

Mr. SMOOT. My attention was called to the testimony given by the Secretary of Agriculture. If $400,000 was sufficient for the eradication of the cattle tick—that is the appropriation to be provided in this bill—I can not possibly see why we should increase this appropriation from $2,010,000 to $4,500,000.

Mr. KENYON. The chairman of the committee, who had better knowledge, it seems to me, than the Secretary of Agriculture possibly could have about this matter, felt that that amount was essential.

Mr. GORE. I will say that my information was gained from the Bureau of Animal Industry; that it would require between three and four million dollars to complete the work of eradicating the cattle tick. We have added two and a half million dollars, I do not know upon what basis, but it will be apportioned among these diseases and the other diseases and pests enumerated in this section. We appropriated, as I remember, at one time, by a joint resolution, $600,000 for the extermination of hog cholera.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GORE. And if this were apportioned on the same basis as that, perhaps $600,000 would go to the same purpose now. They certainly could use that much.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, is there any time fixed within which this $4,000,000 is to be used?

Mr. GORE. It is appropriated for a somewhat slightly longer period than the period of the war. The bill itself expires with the beginning of the first fiscal year after the return of peace.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say in this connection that, in my opinion, we should not appropriate money for this or for any other purpose to extend over a period longer than the coming fiscal year.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. The Senate will meet in December; we shall then have an agricultural appropriation bill before the Senate. The Secretary of Agriculture at that time will know whether or not the department wants more money. I do not believe it is right and proper, having already passed the Agricultural appropriation bill for the coming fiscal year, to bring in another bill and appropriate money with a view of having a sufficient sum to eradicate cattle diseases in all parts of the United States without regard to time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator from Utah, I desire to say that there is a great deal of force in his statement; but I should like to know from the chairman of the committee whether this appropriation is made with a view of authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into a contract with the different localities for the continuous work of eradicating the cattle tick? Is that the purpose of the bill?

Mr. GORE. I think so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I can not see what relation this appropriation has with the continuation of the war. I do not see what connection there is between the two.

Mr. GORE. I may say that the whole purpose of the bill is to stimulate the production of foodstuffs. If that is not necessary, of course the whole bill is a misconception of the situation and it ought to be defeated. Apart, however, from the census and the seed proposition, there is nothing else in the measure. The Secretary of Agriculture was of the opinion that he could do a great deal to stimulate the production of foodstuffs, including live stock, and this bill is designed to enable him to institute a campaign for that purpose.

I think one difficulty in the extermination of the cattle tick and other diseases lies in the fact that we are limited arbitrarily by the fiscal year, and the Secretary could not elaborate a system covering a sufficient time, looking far enough into the future, and providing ample organization to carry this business to a successful conclusion. Ithink this is a splendid opportunity to do what we ought to have done long ago. If we ought to appropriate only for fiscal years, of course the entire bill, with one or two exceptions, is subject to that objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want the Senator from Oklahoma to understand that I am not objecting to appropriations for the purposes provided for in this bill.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the objection which the Senator makes.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not objecting to that; but what I want to impress upon the Senator, if I can do so, is to have the Senator give to the Senate an estimate of how much money should be appropriated for the eradication of hog cholera, the cattle tick, and contagious abortion in cattle for the following year over and above that which we have already appropriated.

Mr. GORE. That depends on this——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment.

Mr. GORE. Well, I think I can answer the Senator's question.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to complete my second question, and then the Senator can answer both.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. If we appropriated in the Agricultural appropriation bill that has already become a law a million dollars for these very purposes, it does seem to me that if we double that amount that is all that we ought to do at this time. When the Agricultural appropriation bill was before the Senate we knew that we were going to be at war; we knew the necessity of conserving our food supply; and we also knew of the shortage of meat products in this country. With all that knowledge we made certain appropriations as asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture. I am quite in harmony with the Senator from Oklahoma in asking for an additional amount; but it does seem to me, if we add a million dollars to the $2,010,000 that was originally provided for in the bill—for I take it that the original bill was prepared in the Agricultural Department—that would be ample for the coming year. In the coming December—just a few months ahead—the Senate will be in session. If we find that we lack money at that time for this very purpose, all the Secretary of Agriculture will have to do will be to ask for an appropriation and he will get it. I believe now that that would be the best policy to follow, and I sincerely hope that the Senator will approve of it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it occurred to be while the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] was reading from the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture to ask the question as to whether the Secretary of Agriculture had in mind $400,000 as the sum that could be reasonably expended in the eradication of the cattle tick, in addition to the appropriation made on the 1st of March last?

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understood his testimony.

Mr. KENYON. I understand it in that way from the nature of the questions that were asked the Secretary.

Mr. STERLING. Assuming that that is true, then we would have about a million dollars for that purpose, if we were to appropriate according to the estimate by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. As I understand, all of the appropriation of, I think, $631,000 for this purpose will be available after the 1st of July next; and I wondered whether that amount is not as large as might be wisely and judiciously used, especially within the time before the convening of the next session of Congress, in the matter of the eradication of the cattle tick?

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will indulge me a moment further, before voting for an appropriation like this I should like to see some definite statement from the Secretary of Agriculture as to the need of such an appropriation and the prospect of using it wisely and judiciously for the particular purpose named in the bill. I should like to see a statement of the number of employees who would be required and who could be used in the expenditure of $4,500,000. There is quite an army of employees now—as I remember, something in the neighborhood of 300 or more—engaged in this very work, and $4,500,000, or the half of that sum, will require the employment of a tremendous number of agents in this particular service. I do not think, as the Senator from Oklahoma would seem to think, that this can be done in a day or a month, or in six months, for that matter; but that is a gradual process and work, and the sum already appropriated will be all that could be wisely spent in the time intervening between the 1st of July and when Congress next convenes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that it is now half past 5 o'clock; we have been in session five hours and a half, and I am going to ask him to allow this paragraph to go over.

Mr. GORE. I was about to move that the Senate take a recess, but I understand some Senator desires recognition before that is done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the recess is taken, I know the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has an amendment which he is considering offering to this bill, and I think it would be very helpful to us if he would present it this afternoon in order that it might be printed, so that we might all have a chance to read it in the morning.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to comply with the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia. I will say, by way of preliminary, that a bill was introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], being the bill (S. 315) to punish the storing of foodstuffs for the purpose of cornering the market, and for other purposes. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and then to a subcommittee of that committee, which called to its assistance Mr. Todd, of the Department of Justice, who for quite a number of years has been frequently associated with all of the trust prosecutions. The result of their work was embodied in a report to the Judiciary Committee. They recommended some very material amendments to the bill as presented by the Senator from Washington. I think it would be quite appropriate as an amendment to the bill under consideration, and I send to the desk the bill, and propose it as an amendment to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is now an amendment pending. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Montana to offer his amendment to lie on the table and to be printed?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But not printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WALSH. No; there is no occasion for printing it in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana offers an amendment to lie on the table and be printed. Without objection, such action will be taken.

Mr. SMOOT. I also offer an amendment to lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment, which will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senate concludes its deliberations for the day, and before Senators all leave the Chamber, I call their attention to an article in the Evening Star of to-day and to the following language in the article:

> Mr. Lloyd-George asserted there was no danger to the country—
> That is, England—
> from starvation, but that the utmost economy of foodstuffs was still essential.

Further in the article it is stated that Mr. Lloyd-George said:

> There is a distinct improvement in our food prospects as a result of the improvement in the submarine situation.

And a little further along—I do not intend to read it all—it is stated:

> The people must not rush from one extreme to another. We must appeal to the common sense of the nation. I say, after taking counsel with my advisers and after going into the figures very carefully, that

If the nation economizes and is not guilty of waste, if those who have got lands favorable for the production of food make the best use of them, if the workmen turn out tractors to enable us to plow, if the army helps with the men available—if, in fact, we all behave like reasonable human beings who want to save their country from disaster, privation, and distress—the submarine menace is not one that need cause us any fear that the war is going to be lost for that reason.

I think that is a ray of light, and shows how necessary it is not to get excited.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think we should thank the Senator from Missouri for reading that extract; and we may well consider the question as to whether all of us are preserving our sound judgment. If we have not done so in the past, I hope we will do so in the future, and take our time to consider calmly and act wisely upon the subjects that come before us.

RECESS.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 26, 1917, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 25, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. William Couden, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Dear Lord in Heaven, Thy rich blessings are as common as the light of day, and Thy care infolds us as the gentle darkness of night. Let a realization of Thy presence be with us all. Protect and inspire our soldiers and sailors, our farmers and business men, all our citizens in professional life and in the ranks of manual labor, all our women and children, the greatest and the least amongst us, so that we may be a whole Nation serving and praising Thee. Guide these Thy servants, the Members of this House, in their solemn duties of this day. And save us now and at the last through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXPLOSIVES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 3932) to prohibit the manufacture, use, or possession in time of war of explosives be given a privileged status, to be taken up after the conclusion of this bill, not to interfere with appropriation bills or conference reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill named be made privileged, not to interfere with appropriation bills, conference reports, or anything of that sort. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. What committee reports the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. MANN. To give consent to make it privileged does not mean that we are all in favor of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. MANN. The purpose being simply to expedite business in the hope that we may get away.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the bill make any appropriation?

Mr. FOSTER. It authorizes an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I think it had better come in regular order. I have not had time to read the bill. I may withdraw my objection later, but for the present I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] objects.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial published in the Muncie Star, of Muncie, Ind., in regard to second-class postal rates, which I think is a very valuable contribution to the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE CONSCRIPTION ACT.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, just before the House adjourned on Saturday a resolution (H. Con. Res. 9) was put through by unanimous consent authorizing the publication of a million and a quarter copies of the conscription act, registration instructions thereon, and the proclamation of the President thereof in one pamphlet. The chairman of the Committee on Printing, being called away requested the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. DENT] to at once confer with the Senate, so that we might get this printing through, that the pamphlet might be sent out before conscription day. The Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House was very diligent in his efforts, and finally succeeded in getting a meeting of the Senate Printing Committee on yesterday afternoon, but it was then decided by the Senate Printing Committee that it is now too late to undertake to get this printing out.

I want to say in this connection that it is no fault of the House that we do not have these publications, because we passed the bill in ample time if the Senate had acted promptly. We could have had these publications available now, except for the fact that about five days would be required for the Government Printing Office, running all of their available presses on this document, to print it; and the folding room of the House is so situated that its capacity is only about 50,000 copies a day. At this rate it would require about 25 days to get out the 1,250,000 copies. This delay might have been avoided by having an increased force in the folding room. But the Senate members of the Joint Committee on Printing, without consultation with the House members of the Joint Committee on Printing, authorized the printing of 57,000 copies of the act, and then generously sent over to the document room of the House 20,000 of these copies for the use of the 435 Members of the House and sent to the document room of the Senate 37,000 copies for the 97 Members of the Senate.

I am authorized to say to the House this morning that inasmuch as we have had 20,000 of these documents there will be sent to the document room of the House 10,000 more copies, and inasmuch as it looks as though we were too late to get these other publications in time to get them out before registration day I think about the best thing for us to do is to use these 10,000 copies that are coming to the document room to-day, and I want to make the announcement that there are remaining there now 2,000 copies, making 12,000 in all that we can use.

Mr. MANN. Who ordered the 57,000 copies printed?

Mr. BARNHART. The Senate committee or the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANN. How does the Joint Committee on Printing have a meeting without notice to the House committee?

Mr. BARNHART. I think they probably just issued an order.

Mr. MANN. What authority has the Joint Committee on Printing to issue an order for 57,000 copies? What do they cost?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not know what they cost.

Mr. MANN. I did not suppose that the Joint Committee on Printing had any greater power than the House has; I may be mistaken about that.

Mr. BARNHART. I may be mistaken as to joint committee; it may have been the Senate committee. I was informed that it was the joint committee; in fact, I have a memorandum here to that effect. The members of the committee from the House may have been called, but I was out of the city. The War Department has ordered 161,000 of these instructions to be distributed to the registration officers throughout the country, and for the Joint Committee on Printing for the Senate and House document rooms 57,000 were printed, making a total of 218,000 copies of the act that has been authorized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman considered the fact that there is much information in the conscription act that will be of value to the residents of the respective districts besides the features that pertain to registration?

Mr. BARNHART. That point has been considered, and if the pending bill fails the instructions in relation to the registration will be useless after June 5, but following that will be some instructions as to conscription; and, as far as I am concerned, I thought it would be best to wait before introducing the resolution until these instructions are issued, and then we can substitute these instructions for the registration instructions.

Mr. STAFFORD. And have the later instructions inserted?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION AND WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to make a statement preliminary to making a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there are on the Union Calendar, reported from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, a bill (H. R. 3650) to increase the Interstate Commerce Commission and a bill (H. R. 4050) to amend the war-risk insurance act. The Senate has passed similar bills that are on the Speaker's table, but can not be taken up under the rule without unanimous consent. I now ask unanimous consent that they may be taken up and considered whenever the Speaker can recognize me for that purpose, without being referred to the committee. If they can be considered by unanimous consent, it is our purpose to move to substitute the House bills for the Senate bills.

Mr. MANN. Are they on the calendar?

Mr. ADAMSON. They are both on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that at any time when it is convenient the two bills referred to may be taken up and considered.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what are the bills?

Mr. ADAMSON. The first is House bill 3650, to increase the Interstate Commerce Commission by two members. We passed the bill last year. The Senate has now passed it. And the other bill is to amend the war-risk insurance act. Our purpose is to substitute the House bills for the Senate bills and let them go back to conference.

Mr. MANN. Has the war-risk insurance bill come from the gentleman's committee?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; that is commerce.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries reported it before, did it not?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I introduced the bill at the time, and it has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Senate has passed a similar bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Substantially identical.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And it is our wish to take up and consider the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. MANN. Neither of the bills have been reported to the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; they are both on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. Neither of the Senate bills have been reported to the House, and one of them is very different from the House bill. We have no print of the Senate bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thought it was printed.

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to be reported to the House. I have no objection to its being considered.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not ask to interrupt the present business, but I did not want the bills referred to our committee, because our committee has already considered both questions and will insist on the House bills.

Mr. MANN. Neither committee has considered the Senate bill. We have not the Senate bill before us and will not have if the gentleman's request is acceded to. I think the bills ought to be reported—the gentleman can report them at once—and then we will have the Senate bill and the House bill in connection.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman means that he wants them to go to our committee?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to make a statement for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, it is the purpose of the River and Harbor Committee to call up the river and harbor bill (H. R. 4285) after the close of the consideration of the food-survey bill, if nothing else intervenes which in the opinion of the Speaker will make it undesirable; otherwise we will bring it up as early as possible.

Mr. MANN. That means that it may come up to-morrow?

Mr. SMALL. If this bill now under consideration should be completed to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are two or three conference reports suspended between heaven and earth, and they are liable to come in any time.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that the bill H. R. 3932 be made privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois renews his request as to the bill in reference to explosives, that it be made privileged. Is there objection?

Mr. SMALL. Reserving the right to object, I desire to make an inquiry. If the request of the gentleman from Illinois is granted making that bill privileged, will it interfere with the consideration of the river and harbor bill?

The SPEAKER. The river and harbor bill is privileged, and it would depend upon which one it was thought best to take up first.

Mr. SMALL. Who decides that matter?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the conference about this matter, I assume the river and harbor bill will be taken up first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman better not make any assumption about it.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, we think that we ought to know on this side of the House as near as we can which of these bills will come up first.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask my friend from North Carolina to permit this request to be granted.

Mr. MANN. It might be well for the river and harbor bill to go over until next week.

Mr. SMALL. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will agree that the river and harbor bill will come up first, I have no objection to this request.

Mr. FOSTER. Rather than make the gentleman that kind of a promise, I would risk the kindness of the Speaker.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will get his bill up more quickly by not making his request, if the river and harbor bill is to come up first.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how long will this bill take?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it will take a very long time. However, no one can tell that in advance.

Mr. MANN. Just what is the request?

Mr. FOSTER. The request is that we may take up this bill after the conclusion of the bill now under consideration and that it be given a privileged status, not to interfere with appropriation bills or conference reports.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will make his request that it shall be in order to take up that bill at the conclusion of the consideration of the Lever bill, now under consideration, subject to appropriation bills, and so forth, I shall not object, with the understanding that we are going to take it up.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall take it up if we can get unanimous consent to do so.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the request to be that it should come up for consideration next. I understood the request to be that it should have a privileged status.

Mr. FOSTER. It will come up after the bill now under consideration.

Mr. SMALL. To be left to the Speaker to determine the matter. I object to the question in that form.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman will not make any progress in his own bill if he objects now to this.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not debatable.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4188, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the committee rose yesterday afternoon section 3 of the bill had been read.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, a number of amendments to section 3 were printed in the RECORD for information, but they have not in fact been offered at the desk.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offered one of those amendments.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendments that I offered came first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized, and the Clerk will report the first amendment offered by the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Page 2, line 16, after the word "therefor" strike out the remainder of line 16, all of line 17, and the word "States," in line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "may compel the attendance of witnesses, and."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman should qualify his amendment by striking out the word "and" and inserting in place of it a comma.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the amendment the word "and," as suggested.

Mr. LEVER. I think that makes it better.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I understood the chairman of the committee was willing to accept this amendment. If so, I do not desire to discuss it.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman ought to state what his amendment is.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to limit the range of the subpœna which would be issued to make it conform to the limitation that exists in the use of the subpœna in judicial matters. In other words, the original language, or the language that is to be stricken out if this amendment prevails, would give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to call a witness from any part of the United States to any place in the United States at his will or pleasure. Surely while we are granting these extraordinary powers as the result of the war conditions we ought to be careful to preserve the individual rights of people as far as practicable, and in this instance it might inflict terrible hardship upon a witness to be thus gathered from one part of the United States and taken to some distant point and there subjected to examination.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Not only may the Secretary of Agriculture call these witnesses, but any of his agents may do so.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That probably would be so.

Mr. TOWNER. That is the language.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes. Another amendment which I propose to offer would make this perfectly clear, by adding at the end of the section that while he has power to subpœna witnesses the operation of the subpœna shall be limited:

Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend outside of the judicial district of the district court of the United States wherein such witness resides.

I would add further that a clause similar to this was inserted in the Clayton antitrust law, and upon my motion and explanation of these facts this House struck out that power and confined the operation of the subpœna in the language in which I am asking to have it confined by this amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Is that quite accurate? Is it not true in that law that the subpœna may extend further upon the order of the court in the suit that is pending?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. An application might be made to the court. There is no occasion for such a thing here, because the Secretary of Agriculture or his agents can sit where it is most convenient to take the testimony and not put the citizen to the hardship of being called away from his business and home and be compelled to attend at some distant point where it may be inconvenient and hazardous to his own business interests.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to suggest to the gentleman as a substitute for his amendment the following:

On page 2, strike out, in line 16, the words "at any," all of line 17, and, in line 18, the word "States," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "of any witness at any designated place which, without his consent, shall not be more than 300 miles from his residence or place of business."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; the purpose is best effected by keeping up the similarity between the use of the subpœna here and the use of it in judicial proceedings. If it is efficacious for the disposition of all matters of justice in our courts it certainly can be just as efficacious with the Secretary of Agriculture or his agents, who can move from place to place and take his testimony and is not, like a court, confined to one place.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to a question for information?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. COX. What is the law now in the practice of the Federal court—if I ever knew it, it has escaped my attention—as to how far a subpœna issued by the district court, say, in Pennsylvania, will run throughout the United States?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It runs in civil matters only in the jurisdiction of the court, or within 100 miles of the courthouse.

Mr. COX. How far does it run in criminal matters?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In criminal matters the subpœna can be sent throughout the United States.

Mr. COX. That is what I thought.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But that is based, as the gentleman well knows, I am very sure, upon the principle that underlies all criminal proceedings, that the man has the constitutional right to be brought face to face with his witnesses and accusers. That is the reason for it in that class of cases.

Mr. COX. In civil proceedings it is confined within a radius of 100 miles from the courthouse?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. From the courthouse.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee will indulge the Chair a moment, he would like to make this statement: On motion yesterday afternoon section 2 went out of the bill, and the Clerk was by unanimous consent authorized to renumber the sections, so that this section which is now being considered is section 2 instead of section 3. Members have been referring to it as section 3.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Would it not be more convenient to have the sections renumbered just before the engrossment of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It might be done, but the Clerk has been instructed to renumber the sections. In that case we would refer to section 2.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I may be permitted, there is no occasion for confusion arising about that, because it is a matter of common practice for consent to be given for the renumbering of the sections, and that always means that they shall be renumbered after the bill has been concluded in accordance with the arrangement that has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. If everyone understands it that way, there will be no confusion, and, without objection, that will be the order. The Clerk will not renumber the sections until after the bill is concluded.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], it or a similar amendment, in my opinion, ought to be adopted. One can hardly read the bill without being impressed with the fact that too large an authority is vested in the Secretary of Agriculture and in his officials and agents in the matter of subpœnaing witnesses and requiring their attendance. And as the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], will recall, that matter was discussed in the committee, and my impression was that an agreement similar to the one offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was adopted; but the chairman informs me that I am wrong. I am in favor of such an amendment. And when we approached that section last evening I prepared one limiting the distance that one could be required to travel to the limits of the State in which he was summoned. By talking with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], and having the benefit of his wide experience in matters of this kind, I came to the conclusion that his amendment would meet the situation perhaps better than mine. And so I did not offer my amendment.

Now, I think an amendment of this kind ought to be adopted. No man ought to be permitted, and the law ought not to be so framed as to permit under any circumstances, a witness to be called from one end of the country to the other to testify. There ought to be some limitation.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. It is true this matter was discussed thoroughly in the committee, and the committee was pretty evenly divided on the proposition. I was wondering if we might not agree to limit it to the residents of the State in which the witness should live—the States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. As I stated a moment ago, that was the amendment that I prepared, but I did not present it after talking with the gentleman from Pennsylvania and learning what his amendment is. I am not particular, but some amendment, one or the other, his or mine, ought to be adopted.

Mr. LEVER. I think if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] would agree to accept an amendment such as the gentleman from Michigan offered in the committee, limiting the subpœna to the States or the District of Columbia or the Territories, there would not be any difficulty on this subject. I think we could agree on that proposition.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. This comes to my mind, Mr. Chairman: If the witness refuses to give his testimony where first notified and it becomes necessary to subpœna him or take him from his home for the purpose of compelling him to testify, ordinarily I should think that that proceeding would be under the direction of the United States court, and in all probability the witness would be taken to the place where the court sits. In that case it would be more convenient for him to go to that place rather than to be required to travel a longer distance to some remote part of the State.

Mr. LEVER. In the gentleman's time let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] if he would agree to the suggestion of the gentleman?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I think not. I think it would work out inharmoniously and be injurious. The average distance to a courthouse from the center of the district is well known, and the ways of reaching the courthouse are well known, and it is better to conform to the established judicial practice than to devise some new method of subpœnaing witnesses.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman speaks of a "courthouse." This would be the seat of the United States court in the judicial district. It would not be to the county courthouse. Your amendment has no relation to the county?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. None whatever.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that it seems to me it will be extremely advisable to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I conclude the statement I was making?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The administration of justice through the courts of the country has for a long time proceeded on well-established lines. The residents of a judicial district know where the court is to be found. Usually the court sits at a center easily accessible to all parts of the district, by railway or by other means of transportation; and if we should follow the suggestion made that witnesses be subpœnaed from all over a State to any part in the State, the gentleman can readily see that that is in violation of all the established usages in the trial of civil cases, and would result in serious hardship. For instance, in the State of Texas, though that is an extreme case, they might subpœna a man to go from the Pan Handle to Brownsville. He could go just as quickly from the Pan Handle to New York; perhaps not quite as quickly. But take a State like my own—Minnesota—450 miles long. A man might be subpœnaed from the extreme northwestern corner of the State to St. Paul, a distance of about 300 miles. As a matter of fact, there is a judicial district and a district court frequently held in that northwestern part of the State. It seems to me there could be no expedition in the determination of these cases by requiring witnesses to travel so far. On the contrary, I think there would be hardship and delay and confusion, and I think the committee would do well to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I thank the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] for yielding to me, and apologize to him for taking so much of his time.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to make this suggestion to the chairman of the committee for his consideration: It will be noticed that one of the most objectionable features of the proposition contained in section 3 now is the fact that the Secretary or his agents may compel the attendance of witnesses even without any subpœna. I think the chairman of the committee can at once see that if it is necessary to obtain either the testimony of the witnesses or papers or documents there should be something that would officially notify him of what may be expected of him. Of course subsequently it says that subpœnas may be issued, but the power is granted both to the Secretary and his agents to compel the attendance of witnesses even without subpœna. For that reason it occurs to me that it would be wise to accept the suggestion.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the penalty all based on the refusal to obey the subpœna?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I think that is true; but I think the gentleman will clearly understand that if confronted with the statement that the Secretary or his agents will be able to compel the attendance of witnesses, the witnesses may not know what their rights may be.

Mr. HARDY. I think what the gentleman says is true if it were applicable to ignorant and uninformed witnesses, but the purpose of this bill is to get at conspiracies intended to affect these products, and the men likely to be examined are the men concerned in these conspiracies, and they will not go before these authorities without consulting counsel. They will know that they are being sought after. They are not innocents, and they will immediately engage the services of counsel and be well informed as to their rights. The gentleman admits that the subpœna is to be issued; that it must be issued before any penalty attaches for not appearing as a witness, but he thinks that the people in their ignorance will not know this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. IGOE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ANDERSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota, a member of the committee, desire recognition?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] will give me his attention, I understand his amendment provides that witnesses can not be compelled to attend outside the district in which they reside, and it occurs to me in connection with the examination of books, and so forth, of corporations, that under his amendment you could not compel the attendance of witnesses, although they might be in the city, if they did not reside there—directors of corporations, and so forth. Is that the intention?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. This does not provide that.

Mr. IGOE. You say they can not be compelled to attend outside the district in which they reside. Suppose you need a witness in connection with the examination?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If a corporation is located in the city of A, and the officers in charge of the books are in the city of A, they necessarily will be residents of the city of A.

Mr. IGOE. Suppose they reside elsewhere?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. They will reside where the office of the corporation is, and when you subpœna one of those officers with a deuces tecum clause in the subpœna he is bound to produce the books of the corporation.

Mr. IGOE. All right, now; suppose he lives 50 miles away from A, outside of the district or across the State line, how are you going to get the testimony unless you bring the books over to where he is and have him come in and testify?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If he is the man in charge of the books, it is very easily done. This case is not like that of a court, located in a specific place, but the agent can cross the State line and say, "I want you to bring your books before me." He could not answer that the books were in the other place. If they are under his authority he must produce them, and every lawyer knows that.

Mr. IGOE. He may not have the books with him. They may be in some other place.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. You can mention a hundred things that might be, but the other is the greater evil.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it may be that there should be some limitation on the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to compel the attendance of witnesses. I am inclined to think, however, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania restricts the provision to a greater extent than it ought to be restricted. But I might say as a preface that the proposition contained in this bill is by no means as novel a one as the gentleman from Pennsylvania would seem to make it appear. It is not even new to administrative procedure under the Federal Government. I may say that substantially the same provisions are contained in the interstate commerce act and the same provisions are contained in the Federal Trade Commission act. The same power is given to the Interstate Commerce Commission. This is not a court proceeding; it is purely an investigational proceeding. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would prohibit compelling at a hearing held in St. Paul the attendance of witnesses across the river at Hudson, Wis., for instance. There would be numerous cases of that kind, where it would be impracticable to compel the attendance of witnesses under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The difficulty the gentleman suggests could arise if this investigator had a local habitation in which he was obliged to remain; but the gentleman speaks about not being able to subpœna a witness across the river. The movement across the river of the investigator would be a simple thing, and he could subpœna the man and investigate him there. The object of my amendment is to make it easier for the citizens who are to be disturbed by the investigation. The investigation can go on, but the Government will be making it in the way that will be most accommodating, and easiest and best and least inconvenient for the people of the country, who are the masters of the Government.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is trying to deal with a situation which is not likely to arise, and one that in all probability will not arise. I assume that the Secretary of Agriculture and the people whom he will appoint under this section will have some sense, and that they will use some judgment in the exercise of the authority given under this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On May 7, 1917:

H. R. 2893. An act to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code.

On May 12, 1917:

H. R. 13. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

On May 18, 1917:

H. R. 3545. An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

On May 22, 1917:

H. R. 2337. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force;

H. R. 2343. An act granting consent to Ernest B. Denison, A. J. Barchfield, and Ethan I. Dodds to construct a bridge across the Wabash River within or near the city limits of the city of Vincennes, Ind.;

H. R. 3330. An act to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes;

S. 1006. An act authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county;

S. 1007. An act authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place; and

S. J. Res. 61. Joint resolution to grant authority for the erection of temporary buildings at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, this matter of the running of the subpœna in this section of the bill has given me considerable worry. I am not a lawyer and I am not familiar with court procedure. The lawyers on the committee differ among themselves on this proposition. I assume myself that under this section we are trying to get the fullest kind of information for the use of the Government. I assume that we are not going to use the powers granted by this section to harrass or harry the people of this country. I must assume also that the Secretary of Agriculture and his agents in exercising this authority would use ordinary discretion and good sense. I do not and can not anticipate the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I can see, however, that in a city like New York, for instance, where there are probably two or three or four judicial districts—how many are there?

Mr. HULBERT. There are two in New York City—the southern and eastern districts.

Mr. LEVER. I had been informed that there were more than one—that you would have difficulty in enforcing the provisions of this act under the method suggested in the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. So I feel that this matter, having been carefully considered by the committee and carefully discussed, had better remain as the committee reported it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. MANN. The Capital is here, the Department of Agriculture is located here, this is in the extreme eastern portion of the country; does not the gentleman think it very likely that if the Department of Agriculture is given full authority it would be tempted to subpœna witnesses from Texas, from California, from Omaha, from Kansas City, and St. Paul to come to Washington?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think so. I think it would be an absolutely inexcusable exercise of this power.

Mr. MANN. If it is an unreasonable exercise of power, then it is an unreasonable power to confer upon them.

Mr. LEVER. There might arise a situation that would demand that they bring a witness from a distance. For instance, suppose they were investigating a storage concern in the city of Chicago and the chief operator of that storage concern happened to be in California. I think they ought to have the power to bring a witness to Chicago to take his testimony where his books are, where he lives, and I think under such circumstance only would this power be exercised. The Interstate Commerce Commission sends its men to places where investigations are to be conducted, and I take it that the Department of Agriculture would do the same thing.

Mr. MANN. The agents of the Interstate Commerce Commission can not send subpœnas out over the country calling witnesses to come wherever they pleased. The Interstate Commerce Commission may send a subpœna, but the agent may not send a subpœna except under certain conditions.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's objection is to the word "agent" in relation to the subpœnas.

Mr. MANN. If the exercise of power was solely by the Secretary of Agriculture, I would have no objection.

Mr. LEVER. That would be impracticable.

Mr. MANN. This gives the power to some young gentleman nicely located in Washington with his wife, knowing that witnesses travel at the expense of the Government, to bring the witness here a long distance instead of making the trip himself, and he will be disposed to exercise that power.

Mr. LEVER. I think the disposition would be in the other direction.

Mr. MANN. No; it would not.

Mr. LEVER. I think so.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, what is the amendment now pending?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment: On page 2, line 16, strike out the remainder of line 16 and all of line 17, and the word "States" in line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the words "may compel the attendance of witnesses."

Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent also that the other amendment which I offer may be considered in connection with that and a part of it, because it is necessary in order to make sense of the situation. That is to say, on page 2, line 16, after the word "therefore," strike out the remainder of line 16 and line 17 and the word "States," in line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the words "may compel the attendance of witnesses"; and, on page 3, line 12, after the word "States," insert "Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend outside of the district court of the United States wherein such witness resides."

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman asks that the two amendments be considered together?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the two amendments shall be considered together and voted upon together. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. I shall object to that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment. But I will yield first to the gentleman from Texas, who wishes to make a statement.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, especially the last clause, which he wishes to be considered together with the first—that is, the amendment making process only run to the limits of the judicial district—that it seems to me the effect of the amendment as a whole would be to prevent the useful purpose of the investigation by always confining the investigation to the bailiwick in which the conspiracy might be attempted to be carried out. There might be reasons why the Government should decide to conduct an investigation in Washington of a conspiracy to control food prices in New York. There might be local influences which the Government would not like to encounter. This amendment would limit the investigation to the district in which the conspiracy took place. It would break up the continuity of any investigation. It would make the investigation of the Government necessarily conducted in a "fly-by-night" way, while I think the purpose was to enable the Government to conduct unhampered by vexing obstructions all investigations of such violations of the provisions of the act as might be detrimental to the whole country. In criminal prosecutions there is no restriction on the running of a subpœna. If it was necessary to give the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the Trade Commission, and to the various other agencies of the Government, I think that must have been the reason of the committee giving in this case the right for subpœnas to run to any portion of the United States, knowing that the Agricultural Department was not likely to abuse the privilege to the detriment of the people.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McLAUGHLIN: After the word "outside," in the second Graham amendment, strike out the words "of the judicial district of the district court of the United States," and in lieu thereof insert the words "of the State," so that it will read: "Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend outside of the State wherein such witness resides."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The amendment that it is sought to amend is not yet under consideration; it has not been reported to the committee as yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order is well taken. The amendment is not yet before the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand this section, it is largely in the nature of a survey or census to be taken by the Secretary of Agriculture of the food and allied articles, as stated in the section.

When I read this bill originally the thought occurred to me, why could not the work as enumerated in this section be as well performed by the director of the census? But we are not considering that question now, though it is of that allied character to the work performed by the director of the census in acquiring information. Why should we under the stress of conditions delegate such great power to the Secretary of Agriculture, and particularly to his agents, to permit them for their convenience alone to summon persons from all over the country here to Washington or to some central point to acquire information that can under the usual routine be acquired by visiting the respective districts or States? I do not believe we should vest this autocratic power in some subordinate agent, and allow him to have a subpœna issue calling upon some person, perhaps in San Francisco, who may be very much occupied in business affairs, to attend in Chicago upon some investigation merely relating to the collation of facts that is deemed necessary in order to facilitate a survey of the food supply in the country. I firmly believe there should be some limitation, and that this power, as recommended by the committee and originally suggested, I suppose, by the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture, should be restricted. We all know that this bill was hurriedly presented to the House because of the urgent necessity of having some legislation passed before the planting season. That was the statement of the chairman of the committee when the bill was presented—that if the bill was not passed at the time it was originally considered two weeks ago the urgency for this year would be passed.

We may just as well look that phase of the subject in the face and know that this bill has not been given that thorough consideration by the Committee on Agriculture that usually characterizes its work. I do not believe this should be passed in this way. Even the chairman of the committee had a tentative amendment suggesting its limitation. Why should we authorize some subordinate to be vested with great powers to subpœna any person from any part of the United States to attend and merely furnish this information which can be obtained by his going into the respective districts and localities?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HELM. I am curious to know what is the gentleman's understanding in respect to the purport of this section? Ultimately all must come down to these agents of the Secretary of Agriculture. Do I understand that these agents, who it has been suggested are students of agricultural colleges and men who are going about and giving lectures, are to constitute themselves a court and issue subpœnas and have these subpœnas returnable before them? Are these people, inexperienced in the procedure of law and investigations of this kind, to constitute themselves a court of investigation and go up against one of these big packing houses or grain elevators in matters of tremendous importance? Do I understand that these temporarily appointed agents are to go around about the country and constitute themselves a court to conduct investigation?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question that under the phraseology written in the bill these agents would have the power to do the very thing suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], and that is too great a power to place in the hands of men who have had no experience in the administration of affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, if I understand language, it seems to me that this is too great a power to be delegated to agents of the Department of Agriculture. For the purpose of this section the Secretary of Agriculture and his agents duly authorized therefor may compel the attendance at any designated place of witnesses from any part of the United States. Who issues the subpœna in the first place? Either the Secretary of Agriculture or his agents? They issue the subpœna, and where is that subpœna made returnable, and before whom? The Secretary of Agriculture issues it, and without any provision in this bill, necessarily it is returnable before the person who issues it, whether he be the Secretary of Agriculture or his agents. It is presumed after section 2 has been stricken out that the employees who are connected with the Department of Agriculture will be in entire control of the proposed investigations, and the further presumption is that they know more about farming and agriculture than they do about law or the investigation of legal matters.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. This bill provides that the agents who shall conduct these investigations are authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture for that particular purpose. In other words, they are not these untrained schoolboys, but must be somebody authorized to do this.

Mr. HELM. They are the men whom the department has sent out to investigate and ascertain the demand for the supply, consumption, cost, and prices of food, and so forth. I presume the department has one or two lawyers connected with it; but here is a vast multitude of agents going out over the country to make these investigations, and the presumption is that these men are farmers, or, if they are not farmers, they should not be connected with the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HELM. The gentleman is interrupting my line of thought and I have only five minutes, and I will not get anywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HELM. Now, if these agents going out over the country find some recalcitrant, some company, corporation, or individual who will not answer the questions for which he was subpœned, will the agent try him or will this subpœna be returnable before some commissioner of a United States court? Certainly the commissioner has more knowledge of law than an agricultural agent that is fitted and qualified as an agricultural expert. It is true these commissioners are only given power to conduct investigation and return their report to the court, and these investigations, provided for in this bill, are going to compare with the investigation of the coal shortage by the Interstate Commerce Commission. To let a man go out from the Bureau of Mines to conduct an investigation as to the shortage of coal, a coal famine, and high prices, would be something absolutely ridiculous and absurd. So it seems to me that this whole section is out of balance, and is not properly drafted. You are starting out on a journey and will get nowhere. Or, if you do get anywhere, you will unquestionably get very unsatisfactory results.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 35.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment now.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the second amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a second amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Page 3, line 12, after the word "States," insert:

"Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend outside of the judicial district of the district court of the United States wherein such witness resides."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent, in order to try to meet the various views that have been expressed, to add to this amendment the following:

Or outside of 100 miles from the place where the investigation is held.

That would cover this question of crossing a river or crossng a State line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. Would not that make a further limitation instead of extending it?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDY. I object.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] desire to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have unanimous consent to have this amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment, and then report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, after the word "States," insert:

"Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend outside of the judicial district of the district court of the United States wherein such witness resides."

Amendment to that amendment offered by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan: After the word "outside" strike out the words "of the judicial district of the district court of the United States" and in lieu thereof insert the words "of the State," so that as amended the amendment will read:

After the word "States," in line 12, page 3, insert:

"Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend outside of the State wherein such witness resides."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. That was objected to.

Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] desire to be recognized now to discuss his amendment?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the limit in which the witness should be called would be the State and not the judicial district. This is not a court proceeding, so that the district in which the district court has jurisdiction has no relation to this matter at all. There is no reason why the limits of the district should be the limits within which the witness should be required to attend.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is of course a Federal proposition?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, why should we recognize State lines?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It is not a court proposition at all. I think the work could be done if the State could be designated as the limit instead of the judicial district. This amendment is in line with my first idea, and I offer it now partly because it meets the approval of the chairman of the committee, who has charge of the bill and has given a lot of attention to it. And it is in line with the discussion we had in the committee.

Mr. LEVER. Let me ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] if he has inserted in the amendments the words "District of Columbia and the Territories"?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I simply said "State."

Mr. LEVER. You ought to make that addition to it, because you could not have investigations in the District of Columbia at all otherwise.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If it is necessary, I ask unanimous consent so to amend the amendment as to include the words that the gentleman from South Carolina suggests.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman kindly indicate what they are?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. "The District of Columbia and any Territory of the United States."

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. I am not very familiar with the practice of the Criminal Code. Is it not practicable to fix a limitation of miles instead of States? Here is a case, for instance of Kansas City, Kans., and Kansas City, Mo.; and in Chicago while making an investigation there is a packing house right across the line in Indiana. If it is practicable, I could see that a limitation of this kind would be more convenient than a limitation by States.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I am not prepared to say that that is not true, and the chairman of the committee now tells me that he has suggested that a limitation be made in miles, providing that no witness should be required to attend a greater distance than 300 miles.

Mr. LEVER. I suggested this morning to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] that I might agree upon this amendment to be inserted at the proper place—"compel the attendance of any witness at any designated place which, without his consent, shall not be more than 300 miles from his residence or place of business." If the gentleman will accept that, I think we could make some time and go ahead. That, it seems to me, would cover the situation very fully and would not work any great hardship.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman be willing to make it 200 miles? If he will, I will agree to it.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that I have been working on this some time, and it represents my own view of the matter. Three hundred miles is not a long distance any more. It does not carry you across many of the States. I hope both gentlemen will accept this.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendments pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendments pending.

Mr. LEVER. The language will have to be changed, because this was prepared to be offered on line 16, page 2. The gentleman's amendment is pending at the end of the section on page 3. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will accept this amendment, I will offer it on page 2, line 16.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from South Carolina permit a suggestion?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Let the amendment that is under consideration be made to read:

Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend from a greater distance than 300 miles from the place where the investigation is held.

Mr. IGOE. I will object to that.

Mr. LEVER. That is practically my amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say that in an investigation conducted in Washington the operator might be operating in Washington; and does the gentleman know that the permanent residences of most people temporarily staying in Washington is outside of Washington? Suppose the operator lived in the State of Washington. Under your amendment he could not be subpœnaed. His residence would be in the State of Washington, but his place of operation would be in the District of Columbia, in the city of Washington, and under the amendment it would be impossible to subpœna him and bring him to the city of Washington.

Mr. MANN. The amendment ought to cover the place where he is found.

Mr. LEVER. I offer it as his residence.

Mr. HAUGEN. Why not leave it to the discretion of the Secretary? Why limit it at all?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] asks unanimous consent to modify the amendment in accordance with his suggestion. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend for a greater distance than 300 miles from his residence or place of business.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania offered in lieu of the pending amendments?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment pending at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has another amendment, which will be reported at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 23 and 24: Strike out all after the word "premises," in line 23; all of line 24 except the word "Any"; and after the said word "premises," on line 23, insert: "in which products enumerated in this section are stored or held," so that as amended the bill will read: "may sign, issue, and serve subpœnas; and may enter, on any business day during the usual hours of business, any place, including any structure, vessel, vehicle, or other premises, in which products enumerated in this section are stored or held."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I do not feel that the committee can accept that amendment. The language of the bill would permit the agents of the Department of Agriculture to go into any place of business, including any structure, vessel, vehicle, or other premises, except a dwelling house, actually occupied exclusively as such, in order to carry out the provisions of this section. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania limits this to such places as contain the articles stored or held. I think I can easily imagine a case of a warehouse in which wheat might be stored, or flour, or meat, but the information concerning the amount of wheat or flour or meat would not be either in the warehouse or in any place connected with the warehouse. The information would probably be in the office of the owner of these products uptown, and if so, as I understand the amendment, it would not be possible to get that information.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. In the case the gentleman speaks of the right to compel the production of books and papers would furnish that information, or the man would be in contempt, would he not?

Mr. LEVER. If that is so, what is the purpose of this amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. Because in case the actual amount of food products or things mentioned are in store, it might be necessary to check up the information you get in the office through the production of books and papers by the actual inspection of the articles themselves.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LEVER. I was going to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] if it is his idea that this amendment here really broadens the authority in this section, or does it limit it?

Mr. LENROOT. It limits it; but it limits it to the right to inspect the articles merely while the authority as now given, gives the right not only to inspect the articles but to go into every office and inspect the books and papers without subpœnaing the witness and compelling production in the ordinary way.

Mr. LEVER. Let me ask the gentleman—because I have great confidence in his judgment—does not the language now give that authority, beginning with line 14, which says that for the purposes of this section the Secretary of Agriculture and his duly authorized agent may do these various things?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but I do not think an agent of the Department of Agriculture ought to have the authority, without the issuing of a subpœna, to go into every office in the United States and inspect papers. I do think he ought to have authority to go into any warehouse, or any place where these things are stored, and make an inspection himself.

Mr. LEVER. Is it the gentleman's idea that as the bill is now drawn these agents would not have the authority to go into these places without a subpœna?

Mr. LENROOT. No; but I think they ought to be limited in their authority to the inspection of the articles themselves.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to know whether the effect of this amendment would be to enable these officers to enter dwelling houses.

Mr. LEVER. We think not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee thinks not.

Mr. LEVER. We think not, and we have undertaken as nearly as we could to safeguard that situation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to protect an ordinary dwelling house from this sort of thing.

Mr. LEVER. The committee is in full agreement with the gentleman on that, and there is no authority for that in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Every farmer at the end of the season puts away his sweet potatoes and Irish potatoes and other products of the farm for family use, and so far as the city man can do it he stores up some for the winter. It is not as customary in the city as it is in the country, but sometimes it is done. I would like to protect such a provident housekeeper from this sort of inspection if it can be done.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman look at line 24, page 2?

Mr. LEVER. We think we have safeguarded the protection of the home under those circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] would permit the Secretary of Agriculture and his agents to enter only the places where agricultural products are stored. I should like to ask him what information the Secretary or his agents will be able to get, if limited only to these places, concerning the "ownership," "production," "transportation," "manufacture," "distribution," and so forth, as stated in this bill? It would seem to me that the gentleman's amendment would practically destroy the entire section.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The purpose of this amendment is to supply something that is lacking at present in the language of the bill. The bill says he can enter on any business day during the usual hours of business, any place, including any structure, vehicle, or other place excepting a dwelling house actually occupied exclusively as such, for what purpose? Enter to examine the books and papers without a previous subpœna, to make an investigation of the premises. Why is he to enter every man's place of business—an unauthorized and perhaps irresponsible agent of the Department of Agriculture? In the prior portions of this bill he has full power to ascertain by subpœna and examination of witnesses who is the owner, who has the title to it, everything concerning it; and as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] properly suggested, this is supplemental and ancillary to that only to the extent that he has a right to check up the testimony of those witnesses as to what quantities are in the place where the things are said to be stored or held in order to see whether that testimony is accurate. Further than that it is oppressive and unjust.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I wish to repeat what I said, or to state further that, in my judgment, if the amendment is adopted, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], there will be practically no right or authority or privilege to the Secretary of Agriculture or his agents to find out anything without special proceedings in court in some way, and just how they would do that I am not able now to say—to get any information concerning the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, or distribution of these things concerning which we wish information.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. As I understand this amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], it simply limits the wording of the bill so that the only places the agent could go into would be places where these products are kept and stored. If that is true, what would happen to the agent if he happened to go into a place where he thought some of these products were stored, but there were not any such products there? He would be liable to damages, would he not?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not know. Those are difficulties that will have to be settled as they arise.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why would he not be liable to damages? But if you limit the agent's rights to go into a barn or a storehouse or a warehouse where crops are kept, what information would he be able to get concerning the ownership, the production, the manufacture, and the transportation? It would be necessary to have access to the man's books and make an inquiry concerning business.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Could he not subpœna and examine him; could he not subpœna every clerk in the establishment and examine them; could he not by a subpœna get the production of the books and examine them, and from them get the information?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does the gentleman think he ought to be required to wait until he could go to the circuit court and get a subpœna if he wanted to get into a mill to learn something of importance respecting the manufacture of food products?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; but would the gentleman have an agent come into his place of business and examine books and go through them without any authority whatever? Have we reached an autocratic state like this? That would be worse than the czardom of Russia.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted, and while I have not read recently the act of Congress on this particular point relating to the operations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, or the Tariff Commission and other commissions, I undertake to say that in no single instance is any power lodged in any of these great commissions such as is proposed in the original text of this bill to lodge in the irresponsible agents of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Is it not a fact that within the past two months the Supreme Court of the United States has held in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission against the Louisville Railroad Co., in an undertaking on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission to compel the president or some officers of the railroad to produce its books in a proceeding based upon a resolution introduced by Senator LEA in the United States Senate with reference to the expenditure by some of the railroads of the South in a political way—where the court held that they had no right to inspect the books, and was not authority conferred upon a commission for that specific purpose?

Mr. LENROOT. That is true, although I do not think it bears upon this question. That, as I remember it, went to the question of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the powers that had been specifically granted to it by Congress to get certain information. I do not question that we can confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture a power to compel the production of books and papers for the purposes designated in this act, but I do not think because we may have the power to do that that we should empower the Secretary to authorize any of his agents, of which there may be many thousands, to go into the office of every business place in this country for the purpose of inspecting books and papers without the issuance of a subpœna and without any official act declaring the purpose for which the inspection is desired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the provision in the interstate-commerce law which provides—

> That for the purposes of this act the commission shall have power to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of all books, papers, tariff contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpœna the commission or any party to a proceeding before a commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section.

And then it goes on to say that the circuit court may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna, issue an order requiring such common carrier or person to come before the commission and produce books and papers and give evidence touching the matter in question, and so forth.

Mr. LENROOT. That is my recollection of the power conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and of course there is not the slightest objection to that power being conferred in this act, as it will be conferred if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Do I understand from the language of this section that the agents of the department issuing the subpœna for a person to appear before him, and upon his failure to do so has the right without the introduction of proof or a hearing on the part of the person so offending to impose a fine of $5,000 and imprison him for two years?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; that would be under a court proceeding.

Mr. HELM. Is not that the language of the section?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not so construe it.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Does the gentleman think that there should be the right of inspection of the place of manufacture as well as the storage?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not, because frankly it seems to me that the only real thing to be accomplished by the right of entry, that can not be accomplished by the subpœna of a witness and the production of books and papers, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated, is by giving a right of entry for the purpose of checking up the testimony and checking up the books and papers. For instance, if the owner of a certain elevator says there are 200,000 bushels of wheat in storage in his elevator and there is reason to believe that instead of 200,000 there is 1,000,000 bushels, we ought to have the right to go into the elevator and find out whether there is 200,000 bushels or 1,000,000 bushels, because to my mind one of the chief benefits of the bill is the food survey, and that information must be secured, and if it is to be of value it must be secured quickly, and it ought not to be so left that it might be secured only at the end of a prosecution in court and the conviction of the man who refused to give the information. To illustrate, without going into detail, I think that we should at the earliest possible moment ascertain how many hundred bushels of wheat have been raised in the United States, how many bushels are necessary for home consumption during the year, how many million bushels we can safely export, and that information should be secured under this bill. I believe it is very desirable that the agents of the Department of Agriculture should be permitted to go into any elevator, any flour mill, storage warehouse, or any warehouse and make inspection of the commodities themselves, but there is not the slightest reason or justification for permitting such an agent to go in and examine books and papers where they can be secured through the ordinary processes of subpœna and the production of books and papers. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire to offer an amendment to this amendment, which it may be necessary to discuss.

Mr. LEVER. Then I shall make it 15 minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. And if the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me, I shall offer it now, so that it may be considered as a part of the discussion that he is about to make.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from New York offers an amendment which will be read from the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. HULBERT moves to amend the Graham amendment by adding thereto the words "except a dwelling house."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following as a substitute for that, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. NORTON offers the following as a substitute: Page 2, line 23, strike out all after the word "premises," and in line 24 strike out all of the line excepting the last word and insert in lieu thereof the following: "in which there is good reason to believe any of the products enumerated in this section are stored or held.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment and the amendment to the amendment and the substitute close in 20 minutes, which would give the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] five minutes, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] five minutes, and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate upon the amendment and the amendment to the amendment and the substitute be limited to 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have only a word to say concerning the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. It will be observed that it limits the right of entry strictly to premises in which products are actually "stored or held." Now, suppose that this amendment should become law and that the officer in the best of faith should enter premises thinking products were stored there and none were there, would not the officer be a trespasser? He would have violated the letter of the law because he had entered a place in which there were no goods, and under this law he is to be permitted to enter only places where goods are actually "stored or held." I think the amendment ought to be qualified by a clause providing that he may enter premises where he has good reason to believe that goods are stored.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In that case the officer who wrongfully enters the dwelling house or premises in an action against him has a defense the same as any police officer, who would have to show probable cause and reasonable grounds of belief.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman's statement would be good law in a case where there was no statute such as this would be, in express terms, authorizing him to enter only places where goods are actually stored.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not at all, because the only danger he incurs is risk of civil action, and in order to sustain an action they would have to show malice and bad faith.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not at all, where, as in this case, he has no authority except such as the statute gives.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, of course, the gentleman realizes that the agent has a right to issue a subpœna for the purpose of interrogating the owner of the premises, with a view to ascertaining whether goods are in there before he makes the entry.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But suppose he should believe that the man who has testified under oath has not told the truth as to where all the goods are located. Is the officer to be a trespasser because he deems it his duty to find goods in some other place?

Mr. HULBERT. Is the gentleman going to destroy the entire structure upon which representative government is founded?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, no; and it would not destroy the right upon which representative government is founded should a man tell an officer that he has products in warehouse B but none of the same kind in warehouse C, in the next township, and the officer should say that he would like to see and should try to find out what is in warehouse C. That would not destroy representative government—at least in Wisconsin.

Mr. REAVIS. If power were granted by this bill to act upon reasonable belief and search, there would not be the same likelihood of perjury, would there?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that the public would be injured at all if this entry was in fact or practice limited to places where it was notorious that goods were stored and held? And then, I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Take the case of a grain elevator. He would have the right to enter whether there was in fact at the particular time a bushel of grain there or not under this language.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That does not meet the situation at all. The amendment does not mention elevators or warehouses. What I have in mind is a situation like this: A Government agent asks a man where he has products stored. He tells him in a certain place. The agent thinks there are goods stored in other premises, say 5 or 6 miles away, because he has been so informed, and he wants to search those premises. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] were to become the law, the officer would enter the last place at his own risk and, if it proved empty, would be a trespasser.

When an officer swears out a warrant to search for stolen goods he does not have to swear to anything except that a theft has been committed and that he has good reason to believe that in certain premises the goods can be found. This bill ought to give the officer the right——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I waive my time for the benefit of my colleague.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask my colleague another question.

The CHAIRMAN. There were 20 minutes on this amendment, part of the time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT], part to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON], and the Chair is uncertain——

Mr. STAFFORD. The chairman of the committee stated five minutes to me, five minutes to my colleague [Mr. COOPER], five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT], and five minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman was in this time agreement he has no right to waive his time to his colleague, but, without objection, it will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose the right to search for stolen goods was in the law expressly limited in these words: "The officer shall have the right to enter premises only where stolen goods are actually concealed." If the officer should enter and search premises where they were not concealed, would he be a trespasser?

Here, under this bill, is an attempt to elicit information very important to all——

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. Here is an attempt to elicit information important to all the people of the United States. The officer under his oath tries to find products for the purpose of conserving the food supply. A man tells him that there are certain goods in a warehouse here, but none of the same kind in the warehouse there. That may be true, but the officer ought not to be prohibited from going into the last-mentioned place, even though it should be proved not to contain products. He ought not to be compelled to assume any risk should there be no goods in the building, because he can not tell until he makes the search.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman speaks of the case of a warehouse. If it is a warehouse, he has the absolute right to go into that warehouse under this amendment, irrespective of whether John Doe's goods are there or whether Richard Roe's goods are there. If it is a warehouse in which products mentioned in this bill are so held and stored, he has a right to go there.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose he should enter a warehouse where goods are not stored. This amendment limits the right of search only to "premises" where the goods are "stored or held."

Mr. LENROOT. If it be a warehouse.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose a man should go within a warehouse that was empty of goods entirely, it would still be a warehouse.

Mr. LENROOT. And he would have the right to enter it under this amendment.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask in my time, before I yield, to have that amendment read again, in answer to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and to show this right of entry is limited not to warehouses but to any "premises" in which the goods are actually stored.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. LENROOT. That is merely descriptive of the character or place.

The CHAIRMAN. If no further debate is desired, the Chair will proceed to put the motion.

Mr. HULBERT. Time has been reserved by two other gentlemen. We had not been informed that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin had expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin had taken his seat.

Mr. HULBERT. He asked in his time to have an amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. That was done, and the gentleman had taken his seat.

Mr. HULBERT. Then I ask to have my five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, the language of the bill as originally drawn authorizes the entry on any business day during the usual hours of business of any place, including any structure, vessel, vehicle, or other premises, except a dwelling house actually occupied exclusively as such. When this measure was before the House for consideration prior to the taking up of the war-revenue bill, I brought to the attention of the chairman of the committee the operation of this law in its relation to apartment houses in large cities, where there were stores for the transaction of business upon the ground floor and the upper floors were occupied for residential purposes.

I had thought at first that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] corrected the objection that might exist—in fact, which did exist—to the original language; but in New York City and in other cities where we have apartment houses and tenement houses, a grocery store or a vegetable store, for instance, in which there are products of the farm, stored for immediate or future use, it would be permissible for a representative of the Department of Agriculture to go into the apartment of any occupant of that apartment house. And so I have offered an amendment to specifically except the premises occupied as a dwelling. And not only does that apply to a man in a city, but it also applies to a man in the country. It applies to a man on the farm, because if in the cellar of his farmhouse he has stored a considerable quantity of his winter's provisions, it seems to me that the language proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] would authorize the representative of the Department of Agriculture to invade the home of the farmer.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman think that a great many farmers store pretty large quantities over what they require for themselves? I have heard, for instance, of a farmer who had 200 bushels of potatoes stored in his cellar in April. He was not going to use them.

Mr. HULBERT. It was customary when I lived in the country to store away potatoes to supply the family and for seed in the cellar for the spring.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Do you not think this would answer your purpose as supplementary to your amendment—before Mr. GRAHAM's amendment insert, after the word "vehicle," "or the parts thereof," so that it would read: "Any structure, vessel, vehicle, or the parts thereof in which products enumerated in this section are stored or held"? That limits it to the part of the structure, vessel, or vehicle.

Mr. HULBERT. The language is unimportant to me. It is the principle. We have always been taught to believe that a man's home is his castle, and I am opposed to giving the Secretary of Agriculture the right to send a subordinate into the home where he may make such investigation as in his judgment he deems proper, amounting to an invasion of a sacred constitutional right of citizenship.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer as an amendment to Mr. GRAHAM's amendment the following——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not offer an amendment in the time of a gentleman having the floor.

Mr. HULBERT. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I offer the following as an amendment to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has an amendment pending, and that an amendment to that amendment is pending, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT], and a substitute is offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Can I offer an amendment to the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. DEMPSEY. So as to make it read: "Amend, page 2, line 23, by striking out 'or other premises except a dwelling house actually occupied exclusively as such' and insert in place thereof, after the word 'vehicle,' the following: 'or the parts thereof in which the products enumerated in this section are or are usually stored or held, except a dwelling house.'"

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman has his amendment in writing, he had better send it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the substitute.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the substitute that I have offered is for the purpose of meeting the conditions explained by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. My substitute is substantially the same phraseology as the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], with this exception: The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to amend by striking out and inserting the following words, "in which any of the products enumerated in this section are stored or held," and I propose to substitute for that this phraseology, "in which there is good reason to believe that any of the products enumerated in this section are stored or held."

I believe an officer should have the right to enter any warehouse or premises where he has good reason to believe that these products are stored and which he desires to examine and ascertain their amount. I do not know that the constitutional rights of our citizens would be greatly endangered if a provision were put into this bill authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture or his agents to enter and examine to a certain extent and for a definite purpose the books and papers of warehousemen; but I do not believe that the provision as it now stands in the bill should be enacted into law. It gives to the Secretary of Agriculture and his agents powers that are too broad and too indefinite. It does not prescribe the purpose for which the Secretary or his agents are warranted in entering a place of business. It seems to me that in framing this clause as it stands in the bill a fundamental part of it was left out. It states here that "the Secretary or his agents may enter on any business day during the usual hours of business any place, including any structure, vessel, vehicle, or other premises except a dwelling house actually occupied exclusively as such." Nowhere in specific terms is it stated for what purpose the Secretary or his agent may enter.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman read that language in connection with the language on line 14 of page 2?

Mr. NORTON. In the same section?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. I read, beginning at line 14, page 2, "For the purposes of this section the Secretary of Agriculture, and his agents duly authorized therefor, may"——

Mr. LEVER. That is the construction that is put on it.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman construes the purpose of the section to be "to investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of food, food material," and so forth. Inferentially it might be held that such would be the reason that the Secretary or his agents would have for entering places of business prescribed.

I do not desire to take the further time of the committee, but I firmly believe that administrative officers should be protected to the extent of giving them the right to enter warehouses or places of storage where they may have reason to believe that these products are stored.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will kindly send up his amendment to the substitute, so that it can be read at the desk.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the substitute offered by Mr. DEMPSEY: Page 2, lines 23 and 24, after the word "vehicle," in line 23, strike out the balance of the line and all of line 24 except the last word, and after the word "vehicle," in line 23, insert "or the parts thereof in which products enumerated by this section are or are usually stored or held, excepting a dwelling house."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT].

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The question being taken, the amendment to the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The question being taken, the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question being taken, the chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. EMERSON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The Committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 45.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 42, and the noes are 45. The amendment is lost.

Mr. EMERSON rose.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order that it is too late.

Mr. HULBERT. I hope the gentleman will not be technical. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] demanded a division, and when the chairman announced the vote he rose——

The CHAIRMAN. The request comes a little late, but the vote is so close——

Mr. HULBERT. The gentleman from Ohio was on his feet.

Mr. LEVER. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. EMERSON. I rose to demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the chairman appointed Mr. HULBERT and Mr. LEVER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 59.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offered an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS: Strike out from the beginning of section 3 down to and including the word "section," in line 1, page 3; strike out the comma, add period, and insert: "The Secretary of Agriculture and his agents duly authorized therefor may issue and serve subpœnaes and compel the attendance of witnesses at any designated place within 300 miles of the place of residence of the witness or of the point where the subpœna is served, the giving of testimony, oral or in writing, under oath or otherwise, the production of books, letters, papers, or documents, and the submission of reports; and may enter places of manufacture or storage, other than those of the producers, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts with regard to the ownerships, present and past, past and contemplated time of storage or of withholding from consumption, quantity, quality, condition, purposes for which held, price paid and at which held, cost and expenses of carriage, profits and losses, and all other transactions and facts of or with regard to foods, food material, and farm products which would be serviceable in preventing food waste, uneconomical storing, transportation, or distribution, unnecessary or extortionate profits or price manipulations, or which would be serviceable to the Government, request therefor having been made by the Department of Justice, in the investigation of or prosecution for any violation of the laws of the United States with regard to such products."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Is that a motion to strike out the entire section?

Mr. SUMNERS. It is not a motion to strike out the entire section. It strikes out a part of the section.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Does the amendment deal with this language in lines 22 and 23, which give authority to these agents to enter any place, including any vessel, vehicle, structure, or premises? I want to suggest to the gentleman that is pure surplusage.

Mr. LEVER. That has been voted on and amended.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It ought to be stricken out. If you have authority to enter any place, you have authority to enter these other places which are included in the greater authority.

Mr. LEVER. That language has been stricken out.

Mr. BORLAND. I reserve a point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] reserves the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment may conclude in 20 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Is this a motion to strike out the section?

Mr. SUMNERS. No; it is to perfect the section.

Mr. CANNON. When you get through, I want to submit a motion to strike it all out.

Mr. LEVER. That will come later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments to this amendment close in 20 minutes.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present an amendment.

Mr. LEVER. This does not exclude the right of the gentleman from Ohio to present his amendment and to speak upon it. I only ask unanimous consent to close debate on this particular amendment in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it seems to me that in the consideration of food-control legislation we ought to have in mind the point at which we are trying to arrive. I am opposed to the expenditure of public funds for the work contemplated by the first part of section 3. I am opposed to the delay of action which the authorization of that expenditure would seem to contemplate. I contend that we know now what ought to be done. Neither the delay nor the expenditure is justified by our circumstances. The Secretary of Agriculture is directed to investigate and ascertain the demand for food products, to ascertain the supply of food products, to ascertain the consumption of food products, to ascertain the cost of food products, to ascertain the price of food products and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, and transportation, and so forth.

Now, I ask, gentlemen of this committee, what do we propose to do with that information after we shall have obtained it? There is no probability that we have too much food. The investigation will give us no more. There is not a gentleman here who does not know this minute that if we produce and conserve to the maximum of the ability of this country we will not fully meet the requirements of this country and of our allies. Every one of us must know that if we spend this money, take the people from production necessary to make the survey, and send them over the country it will not add one bean to the Nation's food supply. All it will add will be to the burden of taxation. [Applause.]

It seems to me, gentlemen, that we have reached the point where we ought to draw the line on that sort of procedure and that sort of expenditure of the public funds. [Applause.] I read the other day in one of the local papers the story of a gentleman's activity, which he evidently regarded of sufficient importance to notify the newspapers with regard to it. I will read it to you:

Highly encouraging reports are being made by H. M. Conolly, of the Department of Agriculture, who is making a survey this week of the District to see how many new gardens have been planted. Yesterday he found an unusual number in the northwest section, and to-day he is visiting Brookland and other northeast sections, which have shown great interest in the garden campaign.

[Laughter.]

Suppose he had found 150 or had found 250 gardens, what difference would it have made in the national policy with reference to gardens? I am willing to appropriate every cent that is necessary to get the information needed for carrying out a determined course of action or for the discovery of facts necessary for the determination of a proper course of action. Suppose we find a certain number of bushels of wheat, what do we propose to do about it? Suppose we should find a lesser number, what are we going to do about that?

Mr. BURNETT. Suppose we find a back-yard garden in Washington, what are you going to do about that? [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNERS. Report it to the newspapers. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNETT. Would not that require an official that we provide for to make a survey of that garden and pay him $2,500?

Mr. SUMNERS. In order to get anywhere, to get accurate information, we ought to know how many turnips and cabbages there are in the gardens.

Mr. CARAWAY. If you make the information public, how many will there be the next morning? [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNERS. That would depend entirely on the neighborhood in which it was situated. Now, gentlemen, this is a very serious matter. Let us see what we need to do. Nobody in the consideration of this matter urges that the farmer is receiving too much profit. I would like to call attention to the fact that the prices paid to the farmers to-day is nature's call to the farm of the producing energy of this country. [Applause.] Whenever we lay the hand of arbitrary control on any essential basic industry we do a very dangerous thing. The best thing to do is to remove the artificial, to remove the obstructions and give the laws of economics, the laws of nature, the fullest opportunity to operate upon the situation. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman think of the laws of nature operating when you have a limited supply and an unlimited demand and time is the essence of the whole thing?

Mr. BURNETT. Get some more surveyors. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has been limited.

Mr. LEVER. I understood the gentleman from Texas was to have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that by unanimous consent debate on this amendment was limited to 20 minutes, anr four gentlemen's names were given to the Chair to be heard.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended to 30 minutes and that the gentleman from Texas have 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time be extended to 30 minutes, of which the gentleman from Texas shall have 10. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, if it be conceded that the farmers of this country are not receiving too much, then the essential thing to do is to find out how it happens that between the public and the man who gets $1 a bushel for his wheat charges accumulate so that the public is made to pay on the basis of $3.50 for the products that come from the wheat. Is not that common sense? Is not that what we should be trying to find out if we do not now know? It is my contention that we know the essential facts now and ought to act now. But if the House will not agree to act now let us not send surveyors too far afield.

There used to be in our neighborhood a very useful dog under certain circumstances. He had a fine nose and was very thorough in his work. He went at things scientifically and marked out every briar patch and brush heap through which the "varmint" in its wanderings may have passed. Mr. Chairman, I mean no disrespect. The fact is, we boys held that dog in the highest esteem. [Laughter.] But there were times when we did not need this exactness, this scientific precision. We did not need that dog when we had the "varmint" in sight, and all the other dogs right after him. [Laughter.] I am not willing to expend money surveying the briar patches and brush heaps when we know the general location of the thing we are after. We know where the trouble is, and let us go right down after it where we know it is located. That is what I am trying to do by this amendment.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield on the subject of dogs?

Mr. SUMNERS. Well.

Mr. KING. I call the gentleman's attention to that historical episode where old Mother Hubbard forgot to make a survey of the food products for her dog, and the cupboard was so bare that the dog got none.

Mr. SUMNERS. What old Mother Hubbard should have done, instead of making a survey, she should have been rustling around getting another bone for the dog. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. She waited too long.

Mr. SUMNERS. She waited too long, and if we are not careful Congress is going to wait too long to do the right thing. We must turn back the tide of population which is sweeping in from the country. We must recognize the fact that we have for a long time been doing the things we are doing now, but the mighty tide of population has swept by us. Our food surplus for a long time has been decreasing. Fundamental economic forces have been destroying the equilibrium of our population as between country and town. In this hour we answer necessity's call for action now, by an offer to survey the situation. We need the best marketing machinery that ingenuity and money can develop to get our products to market. We need plants over the country to cure and preserve the surplus. This food material is rotting now. This is an emergency. The most inexcusable of all mistakes under our circumstances would be that of inaction. I do not want to appear unappreciative of the valuable services which the able and efficient chairman of the Agricultural Committee and its members are rendering, nor as criticizing the general policy of the Department of Agriculture. I regret that I can not agree with them in this matter.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Has the gentleman estimated the time when the number of surveyors required to make this survey will complete their work?

Mr. SUMNERS. No; I have not.

Mr. HAUGEN. There are about 10,000,000 granaries and elevators in this country, and it is expected to have a certificate from each one of them. The bins are to be measured. If we employ 1,000 men and each of them make a survey of 10 elevators a day, it would take 1,000 days, and how long it would take to tabulate the report. I know not, but at least the report would be three years after to-day before the survey could be had and the information furnished to the country.

Mr. SUMNERS. I will say to my friend, in reply to that, that I am trying, at least, to hold this investigation to the elevators, to the places of storage, and to those instrumentalities and businesses which have to do with these products between the farm and the table. There is where the difficulty is, and I want to say to you gentlemen from the cities a few years ago the farmer was absorbing these charges upon distribution, but your people in the cities absorb most of them now. There is but one thing to do, and you had as well face it—you have got to reduce intervening charges or you can not reduce the cost of the table. [Applause.] I am willing to put up the necessary money to make the effort to reduce these intervening charges. I am anxious to do it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The last leaves that have come from the Secretary of Agriculture—I saw them but did not examine them carefully—I am told show that there is twice as much food products stored now as there were a year ago. What are you going to do to remedy that?

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to make myself clear. I am willing to ascertain all the facts with regard to the storage. I am not only willing to do that, but I want to press the matter in order to let the country know—I think I know myself now—how it is that these enormous intervening charges are attached. I am willing to do that, and to spend every single cent necessary to ascertain the facts. If the Secretary is to make this investigation, he ought to find out from those who have these commodities when they bought them, how much they paid for them, how long they contemplate holding them, and what have been the intervening charges and profits, and generally how it is that these two or three dollars are tacked on to the cost of a bushel of wheat.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And how much they have.

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes; all about it. But I want to centralize this investigation and let the Secretary of Agriculture call this gentleman out from snooping around gardens in the District of Columbia and others similarly engaged and put them on the job. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. I understand that the amendment the gentleman offered is the same amendment that is printed in the Record, practically?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. In the last part of the gentleman's amendment he provides for all this inspection, and then you add the words:

Requests therefor having been made by the Department of Justice, in investigation of or prosecution for any violation of the laws of the United States, with regard to such products.

Mr. SUMNERS. I would like to have that go out, and I will tell the gentleman why I put it in.

Mr. RUBEY. If you want that to go, that makes me not so much opposed to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SUMNERS. I will tell you why I put it in. I saw a statement the other day where the Department of Justice was trying to prosecute some of these food barons, as they are called, and it was found out the department could not get the information through the grand jury quickly enough, and they wanted this bill passed in order to get such information, and I put the provision in in order to meet that alleged need. I agree that it ought not to be in this bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that the present very high price of wheat—although I believe now declining on prospects of a better crop—is due to the fact of the great shortage of that commodity, just as the price of cotton advanced on crop failures?

Mr. SUMNERS. It is due to two facts. It is due to shortage, and it is due to manipulation to which our system of distribution so easily lends itself. Now with regard to the practical effects of a mere food census, my colleague, Mr. YOUNG, the other day in the discussion of this bill called attention to the fact that he had a constituent who had bought 70 sacks of flour. If we investigate and find that we have less wheat than his constituent thought we had his constituent will go and buy a few more sacks of flour, and if we find that we have more wheat than he thought we had, then he will quit eating the scorched biscuits.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman in mind any legislative remedy that this committee or Congress can avail itself of to correct the situation he has just adverted to, after we have gotten possession of all these facts?

Mr. SUMNERS. I am going to offer another amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is it?

Mr. SUMNERS. I can not discuss it now in my 10 minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Iowa stated it would take three years to conduct this investigation. What is going to become of the food that has been inventoried at the end of three years?

Mr. BURNETT. We will have more inventories.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman is speaking about the high cost of living prevailing in this country. Is it not due to the fact that not solely foodstuffs but structural material of all kinds have been upon the bargain counter between the allies and the United States prior to the entry of the United States into the war, and since we have become partners with them, we have quit bidding against each other, and the high dollar which has heretofore been buying the output of the factory and the field is now being equalized, and representatives of the different governments, instead of bidding against each other for the output of the factory and the field are beginning to recognize the fact that they are partners in this situation, and therefore prices are inevitably going to a lower level all along the line?

Mr. SUMNERS. I am not sure that I understood my colleague's statement. I understood him to begin his statement with an inquiry of what is the cause of the high prices. Did I correctly understand my colleague?

Mr. HELM. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SUMNERS. I evidently misunderstood my colleague. I understood your inquiry to be in regard to the high prices——

Mr. HELM. You had been speaking of the high cost both of field and factory products.

Mr. SUMNERS. And you are inquiring what was the cause of the tendency of the prices to go down now?

Mr. HELM. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNERS. Certainly the products of the farm are sold to the highest bidder, and, of course, the price of the products of the farm depends not upon the cost of production nor to any consideration for profits, but upon whether or not there is sharp competition among the people who want to buy. Another thing which has affected the situation, of course, has been the near approach of the next harvest.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. A few days ago I received a letter from San Benito, Tex., representing a corporation engaged in truck farming, in which they stated that now there are 2,000 acres of beans being left in the fields around San Benito, with no market for them, and that the farmers are abandoning their fields because they can not get any transportation to get them out of there. Is not one of the real troubles the question of marketing and transportation?

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Does the gentleman believe, or has the gentleman investigated, as a means of preserving the crop such as that which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] referred to, the adoption of a system of dehydrating, which is done in Germany and other nations of Europe?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think section 3 of this bill is the outgrowth of an amendment which I offered to the Agricultural appropriation bill and which was agreed to by the House and went into the law, providing an appropriation for investigating, marketing, transportation, production, storage, manufacture, and so forth, of food products. To have put this in at the same time would have made the amendment subject to a point of order. It comes now in the way of legislation, to give to the Secretary of Agriculture authority under the law to obtain the information for which we have already made a slight appropriation and which will undoubtedly require additional appropriation in the future.

Gentlemen may talk about the low price which the producer receives and the high price which the consumer pays, but, after all, we will never be able to alter the laws of nature or of men's minds. But we can do this. We can through scientific work find methods, I believe, of cheapening the cost of moving the articles from the producers to the final consumer. Many men have had many methods of doing this in the past, but no one yet has suggested a complete solution of the subject, and no one will. But the Agricultural Department, if it is permitted through the aid of theoretical, scientific, and practical men to make these investigations, may find and suggest methods of cheapening the cost of transportation, of saving a product which now is lost, because there is no local demand for it, and of cheapening the cost of storage and holding.

I do not know what they may discover, but I believe it is wise to give them the opportunity to try to see if there is any method which can be suggested along the lines, possibly of natural trade or otherwise, which will enable the country to save that which is now lost and to handle that which is now saved, cheaper than the method now pursued.

I think the provision in the bill, with some modification possibly, has been quite carefully drawn and ought to be sustained by the House.

Gentlemen, however, in this bill propose to give the widest latitude of authority to the Secretary of Agriculture and his agents, and it is not to be wondered at that many Members of this House and many people elsewhere question the desirability of giving such wide authority, in view especially of some of the things that happen. I hold in my hand a clipping from an Omaha paper of recent date, which says:

Carl Vrooman, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, in an address before the Nebraska Food Conservation Congress to-night, said if Russia should collapse America will have to send 5,000,000 men to Europe, and we will have to start doing it rapidly. He predicted that before the end of the present year America will be grinding corn and potatoes into flour.

I do not know whether they will or not; but it was not wise for the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture to make such a statement, which at this time is foolish beyond belief. [Applause.] I do not wonder that some of the gentlemen here hesitate to grant to underofficials of the Secretary of Agriculture discretion which certainly would not have been wisely exercised if possessed by this foolish Assistant Secretary. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have cooperated repeatedly with the gentleman from Texas who proposes this amendment, and I think I understand his views on the subject. I think that I coincide with him very thoroughly. But I do not agree that this amendment ought to be put in at this place. The provisions of the bill were drawn to cover all of the necessary power the Department of Agriculture wanted or needed in this particular measure, and gentlemen must remember that it has to be followed by a measure of more executive force than this. This measure is intended primarily and directly to provide for a food survey, and measured by that test the gentleman's amendment is clearly out of order. If the gentleman's amendment is turning a food survey to ascertain the visible supply of food now on hand——

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In just a moment. Turning a food survey to ascertain the visible supply of food into an antitrust prosecution; and he goes on to say that this shall be done at the request of the Department of Justice, and so on, making his amendment clearly out of order.

Mr. FOCHT. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. For a brief question.

Mr. FOCHT. This is pertinent.

Mr. BORLAND. Very well.

Mr. FOCHT. Do you think it will take three years to obtain the report?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know as to that.

Mr. FOCHT. If it does, there will be two crops between now and then, and what good will the report be?

Mr. LEVER. It will not be three years.

Mr. BORLAND. I agree with what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] said about the problem being a problem of marketing, to get the products from the producer to the consumer; but the trouble about it is to know exactly what the present resources of food are. Not long ago a grain dealer of my city, which is one of the primary grain markets of the world, was discussing with me this $3 wheat, and I said: "Can not any of you gentlemen out there do anything to stop this $3 wheat excitement? You grain dealers are all opposed to it. Can you not do anything to stop it?" He said, "No; not so long as people are going up and down the country shouting about people starving for want of bread." He said: "Future wheat is selling for less than cash wheat on the Kansas City market to-day."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the gentleman think that the speculation in futures has anything to do with the price?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not. It is difficult to answer that question briefly, but as a matter of fact the future speculation often has a steadying effect.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then why, after the exchange was closed in Chicago, did wheat drop 8 or 10 cents a bushel the next day?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know what the conditions were. But ordinarily the purchase of futures has a steadying effect. The difficulty has been in the purchasing of the allies. They have been the greatest offenders in regard to the future price of wheat. They have uniformly bought for future delivery, and that has caused a great deal of that speculation.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that all this departmental agitation and these expressions like the one that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has referred to have had a good deal to do with putting up the price of wheat?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. That is what I wanted to call attention to. What is important in this bill and what the Secretary of Agriculture ought to have the power to do is to find out the present visible supply of food products as quickly and expeditiously as possible. We should leave to this antitrust prosecution other functions, but we will not mix this legislation up with the antitrust prosecution, because we want to know how much food the American people have in sight, and stop this agitation, so far as it is possible, about the rise in the price of food. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] is very important, and goes to the very heart of this bill. I trust the members of the committee will realize its importance. If we are to control the food situation in this country for ourselves and our allies, it is necessary that we should know how much food there is in this country and who has it.

Complaint is made about the very high prices of things. Is it any wonder that prices are high when the warring nations of the world are bidding for that which we are producing without any regard whatever for the prices that are to be paid? If we are to know how many bushels of wheat we can afford to export; if we are to know definitely how many bushels of corn we can afford to allow our allies to have in this war; if we are to know how to protect ourselves against overexportation, we must know how much food we have in this country, how many bushels of wheat, how many bushels of corn, how much meat; and how are you to get it except through the activities that we are proposing to provide for in this bill?

Every country in Europe now engaged in this war is regulating its food supply, and as a basis for action in that regard they have made just such a food survey as we are here proposing. That is the report of Dr. A. E. Taylor, who appeared before our committee and who spent nine months behind the lines in Germany. That is the testimony of Mr. Hoover, of the Belgian Relief Committee, who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture. A food survey is absolutely necessary if we are going to handle this food situation discreetly and wisely and with full effect.

It is all very well for gentlemen to appear on the floor of the House in a serious moment like this and call attention to little mistakes of a great department of the Government. Anybody can do that. It does not take statesmanship to do that. It is a very easy matter for gentlemen to call attention to the mistakes of one employee of the Department of Agriculture out of 17,000 employees of that department. But there is not a Member in this House who desires to be fair to himself and his colleagues who will not credit the great agricultural prosperity of this Nation in a large measure to that great act of 1862 which laid the foundation of the agricultural colleges and the Agricultural Department of this great Government of ours. [Applause.]

Let us be fair, gentlemen. This is no time for small methods. This is no time for turning our eyes in the direction of the folks at home. We have to rise above that. We can not indulge ourselves in these little criticisms that might be pertinent and appropriate in the days of peace. We are doing big things. We are living in a big time and in a big age. Let us measure up to it as statesmen should do. I trust the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] withdraws the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. I will withdraw the point of order so that the committee can vote on the amendment.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the part of the amendment permitting the getting of this information at the request of the Department of Justice be eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. The Clerk will report the modification, striking out the last part referring to the Department of Justice.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, at the end of the amendment, the language "request therefor having been made by the Department of Justice."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk, which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has sent to the desk an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EMERSON: At the end of section 3 insert: "The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to seize all wheat in the United States now held by any person, partnership, or corporation, except the farmer who raised the same, and to pay therefor the price paid the farmer for same plus all costs and expenses in caring for same and handling same since purchasing plus 8 per cent; and sell same to the people of the United States.

"If any person, partnership, or corporation holding any such wheat refuses to accept the price ascertained herein, he may sue the United States in any court of the United States."

Mr. LEVER. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, since the declaration of war against Germany we have voted a seven billion dollar bond issue to be paid by ourselves, our children, and our grandchildren. We are loaning millions to countries without any thought of ever getting it back. We have entered a war to democratize the world. We have voted millions of taxes upon the people of this country. We have taxed the resources of this country to the limit. We have fastened taxes upon the business of this country that may be ruinous. We are taxing the necessities of life. We have voted to conscript men to send to the trenches in Europe. I believe it is now time to conscript the food of this country for the people of this country. [Applause.] It is time for us after extending our bounteous hand across the sea to give a little heed to the welfare of the people of this country.

In the war-ridden districts of Europe hunger has scourged and destroyed its victims by the thousands. Women and children, helpless and dependent, waste away day by day for want of food, and this happens in civilized Europe.

Think what such an experience must be, and yet this experience is happening every day in parts of Europe.

Now they say we are threatened, and we stand appalled at the suggestion, fearing it may be true.

It is now time for Congress to act before these conditions are brought to our door. It is time for men to face plain possibilities. It is time for Congress to act that these unbearable conditions may not be brought home to the people of this country in stern reality.

But a great awakening may be but a few months ahead. What can we do to protect ourselves? What preparation can we make to stay the hand of famine?

This bill can, and if properly drawn should, afford some relief.

The greatest menace in this country to-day, the greatest criminal in this country to-day is the food baron. Those thieves, robbers, and practically murderers, who corner the food products of this country at this critical time of the Nation's history, should be treated just as criminals of the ordinary type are treated.

Congress holds this situation in its own hands and can remedy this situation by proper legislation.

If Congress does not take hold of this food situation and legislate for the benefit of the people, Congress will have to account to the people at some later date.

I do not blame the retailer for these prices, and I am not inclined to blame the producer for these outrageous prices. I place the blame just where it belongs—upon the food broker, the food baron, and the food gambler.

High prices are not caused by the producers of food or by the retailers of food products, but by a class of middlemen who corner these food products and force the prices up beyond all sense or reason; men who are willing to squeeze the last dollar out of the poor people of this country. [Applause.]

I believe in the policy of American food products for Americans first. Our first duty is to the people of this country. Our first duty is to see that our people are fed.

These food barons will continue to boost food prices until Congress takes some action in this matter of regulating food prices, or taking possession of food products and holding them for the use and benefits of the people of this country.

There should be some legislation by Congress to regulate the distribution of food, and, if necessary, the prices of food.

There should be a people's lobby here in Washington to look after the people's interests in this matter of food supply. I notice that everyone else who is interested in legislation here is properly represented here by some one to look after their interests, but the people have no lobby here to watch legislation. There should be a people's lobby to suggest legislation to Congress on these important matters, such as the food supply. There should be a people's lobby here to look over bills pending before Congress and suggest changes, or suggest ways in which the bills could be changed in the interests of all the people.

Speculators should not be permitted to rob the people just because the Nation is at war.

If these speculators continue their devilish work they will either force legislation to regulate prices or force the Government to seize all food products and use them for the benefit of the people. [Applause.]

Congress should do something in this matter of food supply or food regulation before the people of this country rise up and demand some legislation.

You have conscripted men, you have conscripted wealth, and now you should conscript the food supply of this country for the benefit of the people of this country.

If we have not sufficient food supply for our people, we should not export foodstuffs.

We must do one of the following things:

First. Fix prices for necessities.

Second. Seize all necessities.

Third. Not export necessities.

Fourth. Pass legislation to prevent gambling by food barons, brokers, and gamblers in the controlling of the markets. We may have to do all of them before this war is over. We better do some of them now.

In Great Britain they have a commission that buys food and regulates the prices of foodstuffs and regulates the distribution of the same.

In Great Britain they have a food controller, and since his appointment the prices of food have been greatly reduced. They also restrict the number of courses served in fashionable restaurants. They also have power to enter upon idle land and cultivate the same. Prices were fixed at which the Government would buy the farmers' products.

They also permit the mixing of flour from wheat with flour from other grains; something we will have to do.

They make it a penal offense to hoard food. The use of sugar was restricted so that not so much was used for candy, and they prevented the exportation of sugar.

The use of milk was restricted.

Suggestions was made to the people as to what they should eat and in what quantities.

Many other drastic laws were enacted by Great Britain dealing with the food situation. We would do well if we studied them. A food dictator or commissioner should be permitted to seize all food products and to pay a reasonable price for same, not the price that the dealer asks, but a reasonable price; this they do in Great Britain.

What I have said about food regulation in Great Britain is equally true in France, Germany, Austria, and Italy.

They either have commissions to regulate the prices of food or these commissions purchase the food and distribute same to the people at reasonable prices.

Germany, which is probably most sorely pressed for food, has had a commission to report upon food conditions and suggest food measures.

They made many recommendations as to what should be planted in different parts of the Empire.

Germany requisitioned food, fixed the price, and even rationed the supply.

We are perhaps inclined to consider the food situation in Germany from the standpoint of the blockade, but that is not exactly so. It was a war measure, and not only an antiblockade measure but an internal war measure.

Entirely independent from blockade measures, it was necessary for Germany to enact legislation to prevent speculation from within.

Germany is not possessed of a good soil, taking it as a whole, so there is great need of fertilization, and the German Government has gone about this in a methodical sort of a way.

In France things were a little different; but while France had no blockade to undergo, she nevertheless fixed prices. The Government has purchased wheat and sold same back to the people at a loss.

The Congress of the United States should profit by these experiences of European countries.

It seems in Europe it makes no difference whether the country is affected by a blockade or not, there is speculation in food products.

Germany, who is affected by a blockade, is in no worse shape than France or Great Britain, which in the early part of the war had no blockade.

Congress can by the enactment of some suitable legislation prevent conditions from becoming unbearable and thus do a lasting good to the people of this country.

It is the duty of Congress to stand between the people and these food speculators.

We should not sit idly by until it is too late.

Having passed all these war measures, let us now turn to the enactment of legislation that will protect the people of this country from starvation. [Applause.]

Great Britain has passed some very drastic legislation. It is not because of the blockade that Germany has been forced to do these things. In Germany, France, England, and Italy this same class of food speculators have gotten hold of the food supply of those countries and held it for higher prices.

Mr. FOCHT. It has been commonly reported in the daily press that certain nations have made large sums of money by speculation in wheat, and just a few minutes ago in another body I heard a statement about $350,000,000 having been made in wheat gambling. Would the gentleman confiscate that $350,000,000, or what is his idea about that sort of thing at this critical time?

Mr. EMERSON. I think in this critical time, in war time, the Government should take possession of the wheat and sell it to the people of this country. You are going to have to do it before this war ceases, and you might as well start in and do it now. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman know any other way to make the American people economize on food except by high prices? If so, what is it?

Mr. EMERSON. I think people should be taught to economize. They did it in Germany. They had a commission there which suggested what the people should eat and what amount, and what should be raised in different parts of the country, so that they would have a food supply.

Mr. PLATT. In Germany they are registering the people and giving them so much food per capita. Does the gentleman want to do that?

Mr. EMERSON. We may have to do it. I do not want to, but we may have to.

Mr. HASTINGS. As I understand, under the gentlemans' theory, he would exclude the producer.

Mr. EMERSON. I would exclude the producer and the retailer. What I said was that I do not believe the producer or the retailer is to blame for the high cost.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman would take these products from those who store them and pay them the actual cost plus the necessary expenses plus 8 per cent.

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say to the gentleman that I hope the point of order will be withdrawn.

Mr. EMERSON. It ought to be. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. I am in hearty sympathy with the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. EMERSON. The point of order ought to be withdrawn, because if we do not do something of this kind now we may have to do something worse before this war is over.

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has more time, if he wishes to occupy it.

Mr. EMERSON. I would like to say something on the point of order. I can not understand how the amendment is subject to the point of order. It is a drastic bill from the beginning. It provides, in one way and another, to do the very thing that my amendment proposes. I think the amendment is thoroughly germane; and, besides, this bill provides for the seizure of seed, and wheat is seed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not germane to the provisions of the section, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk, which I offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, line 22, page 2, beginning with the word "including," the following: "including any structure, vessel, vehicle, or other premises."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I think, if the chairman of the committee will look at it, he will accept it.

Mr. LEVER. I have tried to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that language has been stricken out.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken. If it has been stricken out, I do not want to repeat it.

Mr. MANN. The language stricken out is after the word "vehicle."

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman may be correct.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am sure that I am correct, for I went to the desk to ascertain the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is incorrect; the words stricken out were after the word "vehicle."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. These words that I move to strike out are surplusage. When you give an agent the authority to enter any place you do not mean to say "including any structure, vessel, vehicle," and so forth. When you give to the agent the right to enter any house you do not need to say "all parts thereof, including the rooms." All of this language is pure surplusage. You can strike it out without any effect on the bill at all.

Mr. MANN. I think somebody had this question in mind, that the words "any place" might not be construed to admit the agent to a building that had doors inside it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. He might have had it in mind, but to give the agent the right to enter "any place" and then say "including all buildings, structures, vehicle," and so forth, is pure surplusage.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman think that the words "any vessel" are surplusage?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why, yes. What can be broader than to say "any place"? If these words are stricken out it leaves the bill without affecting the amendment that has been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, after the word "States" insert the following: "Provided, That in the enforcement of the provisions of this section the Secretary of Agriculture shall not engage for compensation actual or nominal the services of any person or persons who have been associated with corporations or associations that have been dissolved for violations of the antitrust laws."

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman modify his amendment and say "any person subject to draft"?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that an amendment has been adopted at the place where the gentleman places his amendment. I presume that the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires his amendment to come in at the end of the amendment already adopted?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will be adopted because of the peculiar conditions that prevail at the present time. It is announced that the President has appointed a food dictator, who is to act independently of the Secretary of Agriculture. In other words, Congress is informed, through the newspapers, that business is to be transacted by one appointed without the sanction of Congress to make expenditures not authorized.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman says he has been informed through the newspapers. My friend from Pennsylvania seems to place great reliance upon everything he sees in the newspapers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; especially as I see it in the Official Bulletin. [Laughter.] The new organ of the administration states that the President has appointed Herbert C. Hoover to be food dictator. A question about that matter was raised by gentlemen yesterday, who doubted my statement, and I was prepared to-day to meet the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], although I gladly pass the information on to the gentleman from Missouri. There is no question about it. The President has authorized the appointment of Mr. Herbert C. Hoover to be food dictator, to superintend the food supply of the United States, and he is to act in cooperation with or independent of the Secretary of Agriculture, to whom in this bill we propose to appropriate about $19,000,000 to employ a large number of men to make a survey of the farms of the country and further instruct the farmer in the way he should go.

The amendment I have offered proposes to prevent the employment by the Secretary of Agriculture with such money as is here appropriated of persons who may have been connected with organizations that have violated the antitrust laws; and there is a mighty good reason for it, as I shall presently explain. There was a food investigation in the District of Columbia in 1910. It was the first real food investigation that was ever held—certainly the first ever held by Congress, as I happen to know, having been chairman of the subcommittee that conducted it.

Amongst those who appeared at the hearings was a Mr. Clabaugh—Hinton G. Clabaugh, of Birmingham, Ala. He laid before the committee certain very interesting data, which, in substance, was that, having started out to be an independent wholesale grocer at Birmingham with a cash capital of $3,000, he quickly ran up against the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association, which had certain drastic rules and regulations pertaining to its membership, part of which it incorporated in what was called a "Green Book," for circulation amongst the members of the association only. Mr. Clabaugh was not a member of this association.

Mr. Clabaugh's testimony revealed the fact that this association, the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association, had certain alliances with large manufacturing concerns and others by which a rebate was allowed through the association to the particular wholesalers and jobbers that dealt with the association; and it developed, as in the case of Mr. Clabaugh, of Birmingham, Ala., that no one could purchase goods from any of these large manufacturers without the approval of the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association, so that if any man undertook to sell at rates not fixed by the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association he could obtain no supplies. In consequence of this arrangement, adopted by the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association, Mr. Clabaugh was put out of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I object to that. I desire to say to the gentleman that I propose to offer an amendment to strike out the section.

Mr. LEVER. I had the gentleman in mind, and I was reserving a part of that for him.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose we let it run along, because I believe the section ought to be stricken out.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment shall close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it developed that the president of the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association, whose membership was made up of about 1,000 wholesale grocers in the States of Alabama, Arkansas, the District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, the Indian Territory, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, rather than stand to the end an action brought in the Federal courts, a conspiracy charge brought by Mr. Clabaugh, compromised with him by paying $10,000, which was contributed by about 230 members of the association and certain large manufacturers who were in close association with them.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is this the same Mr. Clabaugh who is now the head of the Secret Service of the United States?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was Mr. Hinton G. Clabaugh, late of Birmingham, Ala., a very clever gentleman. I do not know whether he is the same Clabaugh who is now at the head of the Secret Service of the United States or not, but I have seen the name often in connection with the Secret Service. If he is the same man, he is a very bright man, and I believe a competent one. He was one of the best witnesses who ever appeared before a congressional committee, as his testimony will show. Evidently he had the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association "on the hip," because they paid $10,000 in cash in order that the conspiracy proceedings might be dropped.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman wish the House to understand that Mr. Clabaugh was willing to compromise a question of honor, a question of conspiracy, for a cash consideration?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The settlement was made, as I remember, because the gentlemen composing the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association did not want to further contend with Mr. Clabaugh, since he was a very industrious man and had studied the matter of trade conspiracies, and proceeded in this instance with great ability, though he was not a lawyer.

Mr. Chairman, it was a clear case of combination in restraint of trade to boost prices and to prevent retail dealers getting supplies to sell to the people in the States enumerated, except at fixed prices. The attention of the Attorney General was brought to this condition of affairs as it developed from the testimony of Hinton G. Clabaugh and others, and subsequently, proceedings having been started by the Attorney General of the United States, the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association was dissolved, virtually convicted of a conspiracy in restraint of trade.

I mention these facts because some one has intimated that Congress ought to make no suggestions to the administration and certainly no suggestions to the "food dictator" or to any other of these purchasing agents with vast power who are to take control of these matters after Congress adjourns.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I decline to yield now. My idea is that Congress ought to advise, even with Mr. Hoover, who is to have such enormous power as the President has conferred upon him. It may be that he does not understand some of the conditions that hold in the United States in regard to the "big brains" who are bringing him "valuable information" at the present time. It appears from the newspapers this morning that among those who have called on the Council of National Defense to offer services are representatives of the Chicago packing houses. The Chicago packing houses are coming forward to help the Council of National Defense. That of itself is interesting, when we are asking a reduction in the price of food supplies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. All time by agreement has expired. The Chair will put the request. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. WELTY. The gentleman would not allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. WELTY. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, yesterday the gentleman said on the floor that this administration did not prosecute any of the trusts. Was this trust that he speaks of prosecuted under this administration?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; this was prior to the present administration; but I will say to the gentleman that I read in this morning's papers that the administration, through its Federal attorney at Boston, has begun prosecution against 81 corporations and individuals, who are charged with monopolizing commerce in onions, a very important article of food at the present time.

Mr. WELTY. Is it not a fact that the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that the administration is beginning to get active.

Mr. WELTY. Is it not a fact that the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association were successfully prosecuted under this administration?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it was, so much the better for this administration.

Mr. WELTY. Is it not a fact that 42 antitrust prosecutions were commenced under this administration?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me say this to the gentleman: The hearings at which these revelations were made took place in 1910, full two years prior to the Wilson administration.

Mr. WELTY. They were concluded under this administration, were they not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Supreme Court may have rendered its decision during the term of this administration, but the proceedings were probably instituted under another administration. This administration did not obtain prior to 1913.

Mr. WELTY. Is it not a fact that 34 of the Plumbers' Trust were prosecuted in your own State during this administration?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not confirm that statement. I heard the gentleman from Alabama say yesterday that certain trusts in my State were prosecuted. If they were unlawful trusts, I commend the administration if it has convicted them. I would ask the gentleman what I asked the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] yesterday: Does he know of any single "malefactor of great wealth," any man in control of the Beef Trust, or any man in control of the Grain Trust, or any man in control of the Cotton Trust, that has been prosecuted and put in jail under the administration of Woodrow Wilson? I challenge him to name a man. [Applause.]

Mr. WELTY. Do you not know——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield further to the gentleman, because he does not give a name. I would give up time to the gentleman from Alabama, the one great champion of the administration, if——

Mr. HEFLIN. The "gentleman from Alabama" will reply to you later.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Ah! I see Sir Henry of Navarre walking down the aisle now, and I welcome him. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not, because the crux of this statement is coming. "Beware of Greeks bearing gifts," say I to Herbert C. Hoover, who has been abroad for years and may not be acquainted with some of these "great business men" who are volunteering their services to the Government without compensation. Among the very first to tender their services to the Government and "help reduce prices" and "systematize the food production" in the United States, we find the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association. Think of it! Do we want advice from these "efficient business men" who want to serve the Government now and who come to give Mr. Hoover advice for nothing?

A morning paper says:

> Representatives of the Chicago packing houses and of the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association called on Mr. Hoover and volunteered their assistance in carrying out any measure the Government sees fit to take.

Oh, ye gods! They volunteer their assistance to Mr. Hoover, the food dictator, who has just come from Belgium and who may not be quite familiar with all the United States transactions of recent years—volunteer their assistance to him to carry out any measure the Government sees fit to take. The Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association, dissolved for conspiracy against the antitrust laws of the United States, sends a committee to get right on the job at the committee's headquarters in Washington, and to serve without compensation. [Applause.] They are up here from Birmingham, Ala., to stay here at headquarters and tell Mr. Hoover how to conduct this business. They do not want any compensation. No! They are patriotic and want to serve their country. They are willing even to move their headquarters to Washington to be at Mr. Hoover's elbow. Here is the announcement from this morning's papers:

> Representatives of the Chicago packing houses and of the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association called on Mr. Hoover and volunteered their assistance in carrying out any measure the Government sees fit to take.
> The grocers' association sent a committee, which offered to move the association headquarters force to Washington to serve the Government without compensation. The associations' membership numbers 75 per cent of all wholesale grocers in 17 States.

And Mr. Hoover is just back from Belgium! [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he would rather risk him than Vrooman? I think I would take Vrooman.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 50.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LEVER and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. CANNON moves to strike out all of section 3.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this section, as I learn by reading the bill, but more particularly from the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], who has the bill in charge, is the principal thing in the bill, except the appropriations contained in the bill. Those appropriations, I believe, amount to some $20,000,000.

Mr. LEVER. Fourteen million dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Fourteen, in the aggregate. That is a mere bagatelle. No more attention paid to $14,000,000 than——

Mr. HAUGEN. It is $18,510,000.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. I know the gentleman from Illinois wants to be fair and wants the information. The committee a few days ago had another meeting and reduced this appropriation to the total of $14,522,400.

Mr. CANNON. I did not know of that action of the committee. But it is immaterial whether it is $14,000,000 or $20,000,000. It is just a little difference of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000; that is all. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will permit, I will give the items.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] says the committee had a meeting and had taken back four or five millions of it.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman speaks of what was done in the committee, but I am speaking of the bill as it is and what it contains.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. It makes very little difference if the committee reduced this appropriation to $14,000,000 so far as my remarks are concerned.

Now, let us see what this section does. Later on the appropriation comes. This section provides for making an inquiry as to the amount of food now in the United States. Well, how long will it take? What difference does it make? It is a little bit like the physical valuation of railroads. Long before that survey is completed the railroads will be worth probably 50 per cent—God knows—more than they were when the valuation was commenced. I suppose the investigation contemplated here could not be made in less than six months. Then we will have another crop, and this crop that we have will be largely eaten up or exported.

We already have as good information from governmental reports as this investigation would give. First, we know the amount, substantially, of wheat that was produced last year; the amount of corn, the amount of other cereals. We know the amount of consumption, not exactly to the dollar, but we know what it was in former years, and this year it is about so much per capita. But we absolutely know the amount of exports.

Now, then, what is it worth, after you have spent these millions to find out? To be sure, it would give employment to a good many people. Somebody suggested that idea and wanted me to call attention to it. I suggested what I supposed was a little matter of humor that the people who would be appointed would be those not subject to the draft. [Laughter.] God knows if it is to be done in six months and we are to go out to each other's corn cribs and granaries and retail establishments and take this census or make this survey, so that it is reliable and brought down to any better information than we have got now, it will take months and months to do it, and then it will be useless.

The truth of the matter is this country is hysterical. We are all hysterical, more or less, in the country. Why, take the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. That was a wonderfully striking speech he made that my colleague [Mr. MANN] referred to, I believe, at Omaha. But he is not the only pebble on the beach. Listen: I hold in my hand an extract from the Chicago Tribune, which, I think, is perhaps the greatest newspaper in the United States, if not in the world, and this is upon the front page:

Pastor finds tip in Bible: Wheat going up to $8.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed, say, 5 minutes or 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I do not believe I will use 10, but I would be glad to have it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the gentleman's amendment close in 20 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois to have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 20 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois to have 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. I object.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I hate very much to move it, but we have been on this section four solid hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I read:

Wheat at $8 a bushel and barley at $2.70.

This is the price to which these commodities will rise following the war, according to the Rev. Norman H. Camp, of the Moody Bible Institute, who spoke on the subject last evening in the Edgewater Presbyterian Church, Kenmore and Bryn Mawr Avenues.

The minister based his statement on the prophecy recorded in the Bible, Revelations, sixth chapter and fifth verse, which reads: "A measure of wheat for a shilling and three measures of barley for a shilling."

"By this calculation," he said, "wheat will reach nearly $8 and barley $2.70 a bushel. Following the war will come a time of famine, disease, and pestilence. The Bible indicates we are nearing the end of the church age."

You know that comes with a "thus saith the Lord," interpreting Revelations. [Laughter.] Well, St. John—if he was the one that gave us the Revelations—supposed the earth was flat. He did not know anything about the Western Hemisphere, and so on. But there it is. He has got it; he has got it a little worse than most of the people have, but not very much worse than a majority of the people have, you know, who think we are going to starve. [Laughter.]

Now, what is the matter? Wheat did go in the Chicago Board of Trade, I believe, at $3.25 or $3.50. Hysteria, speculation, fright, scare; and cash wheat higher than the speculative price of futures. Well, lo and behold, the board of trade acted and did what perhaps a lawsuit could not have done in months, and they prohibited practically, as they had the power to do, the speculation.

I noticed the quotation a day or two ago that wheat is down to $2.20 or $2.30, or a dollar less, plus. Now, you may say people have no right to make combinations. People have no right to conspire and boost the price of cereals or boost the price of pork or boost the price of stock or boost the price of cotton. Well, if two or more persons do agree to act together for the purpose of manipulating and increasing the prices, I apprehend they could be prosecuted under existing law. God knows, we have got law enough. We want some enforcement of the laws. You may say it can not be done. We have got to have the power placed in one man's hands or this department's hands, if you choose, or in the hands of Mr. Hoover—whom I never saw; I presume he is a very clever gentleman—responsible only to the President, to regulate prices and all that that means. Well, I am not ready for that. We are not in a condition where martial law should be declared in this country. I do not believe this House is ready for it. Do you know what I believe as to how the present prices came about? First there was a shorter crop than common last year in wheat. The demand was larger. That of itself would tend to increase the price of products. Second, it is a matter of getting to market. Why, I am reliably advised that there are cereals in Illinois, and I presume in Iowa, a quarter, and possibly a third, of the crop, that can not be moved for the lack of transportation. I am further informed that the inability to move this grain is partly due to lack of cars, but more largely due to the difficulty of emptying the terminals on the seaboard on account of lack of ocean transportation to permit these products to cross the ocean or to reach the foreign market.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is it not also true that very large orders have been placed in this country for commodities for consumption in European countries?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I have no doubt that prices have been made for future delivery and all that kind of thing, but the principal trouble is that the submarine destroys the ship, and that there are not sufficient ships to keep the terminals on the seaboard empty.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman propose to leave the situation alone, and let it be taken care of by the voluntary action of individuals?

Mr. CANNON. This bill proposes to do what? How would the gentleman remedy the situation? Will this bill remedy it by appointing an army of people by the Agricultural Department, and sending them out to take an account of how many bushels of wheat there are in Kentucky and in every family and in every warehouse, and how many barrels of flour? We already know substantially what part of the crop has not been consumed or exported.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do we know where all the crop is?

Mr. CANNON. Substantially.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is better informed than most of us.

Mr. CANNON. I say substantially. It is in the elevators awaiting shipment in part. It is through the country in part, and the smaller part is waiting to be transported. To transport the crop means, first, cars; second, ships, and God knows we are going to appropriate multiplied millions for ships, and this National Defense Board, I am inclined to think, means to do good work and is doing good work, and I believe we will have better regulation of the railways.

Mr. SHERLEY. I just want to suggest to the gentleman that it may be and is, in my judgment, necessary to get information as to quantities in various localities, and that to cause inquiries to be made does not mean that we have got to inquire as to every bushel of grain in order to get information upon which remedies can be based.

Mr. CANNON. The Secretary of Agriculture to-morrow can touch the wires and ascertain the amount of wheat that is stored in elevators. He can obtain a much better and more accurate estimate of the amount of wheat that is in the hands of the farmer than an army of people as proposed under this section could obtain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. CANNON. No; I guess not.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close——

Mr. STEENERSON. I have another amendment.

Mr. LEVER. This is an amendment to strike out the section.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman let me have two or three minutes more?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time of the gentleman from Illinois will be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is it not likely that all this stuff that these employees are expected to ascertain about will be consumed before they can make a report?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, undoubtedly; and when the information was received it would not be as reliable as that which the Secretary could command and ascertain in the course of a week from reports of stocks on hand and accurate statements of exports.

Mr. SUMNERS. Has the gentleman heard any statement by the proponents of this bill as to what they are going to do with the information after they get it?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know. I do not see that it will be worth anything after it is obtained. It would be like the water that has run over the dam, which turns no machinery.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Just for a question.

Mr. HULBERT. Last December we authorized an investigation of the coal situation.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want to get off onto coal.

Mr. HULBERT. A report has just come in from the Federal Trade Commission in which they say the best thing that can happen now is for everyone to buy as he has been accustomed to buy in former years, and that we will not have any trouble. Does the gentleman believe we will get any more results from the bill under consideration in its present form than we have gotten from the resolution introduced last December for an investigation of the coal supply?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. I am satisfied the gentleman is correct in his statement. [Applause.] The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], eloquent and zealous and able, in the forceful speech that he made not 30 minutes ago said we must have this information, and that that was the necessity for the enactment of this proposed law. I do not agree with him. Are we husbanding all our resources? No; we are not; but this bill will not husband them. I have read recently a very able article on the subject of cotton, published in Baltimore, of which I presume a copy was sent to most of you. That article stated, and I fancy the statement is approximately correct, that if cotton seed was fully utilized, it would be equal in value to more than one-third of the wheat crop. It is utilized to some extent, but not fully. It has been discriminated against, as you know, by the butter people and other people, alleging trusts, and so forth. The South, in my opinion, under the hand of necessity, without further diversification of its crop, by increasing the amount of the cotton it raises and the proper utilization of the seed can add greatly to the food products of the country. But that is a matter that is to be worked out gradually. In conclusion let me say that I have great admiration for the gentleman from South Carolina and great respect for the committee over which he presides, and I have no stones to throw at the Secretary of Agriculure, but I believe if we utilize the forces that we have—not the war forces, although they are being utilized, and I am willing that they should be utilized and encouraged—I believe with the full utilization of our legal forces, so to speak, as in time of peace, and the keeping of our heads, that we are going to get along without starving and will be able to furnish our allies that which we should be able to furnish with our opportunities for production, and the price of foodstuffs will make the farmer do his best to increase his crops. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to see if we could not close debate on this amendment with fairness to all who desire to be heard. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 35 minutes. I do that because a number of gentleman have asked to speak on it. If the gentleman from Minnesota has an amendment which he desires to offer, I will say that if he will offer it I will then see if I can get an agreement to close debate on the section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. STEENERSON. The amendment that I propose to offer is to the section, and perhaps it ought to be considered first before the motion to strike out is voted on.

Mr. LEVER. Let the gentleman offer the amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 14, page 2, after the word "food," insert the following:

"That the President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia, and all persons designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President, whether such appointments are made by the President himself or by the governor or other officer of any State or Territory to perform any duty in the execution of this act, are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such officers and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction of the President. Correspondence in the execution of this act may be carried in penalty envelopes bearing the frank of the Department of Agriculture. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act or the regulations made or directions given thereunder who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Mr. LEVER. On that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Now, I should like to see if we can not get an agreement to close debate. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 30 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want 10 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. If gentlemen who want to speak will indicate to the Chair the time they desire, I will ask the Chair to put the request.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will this debate be confined strictly to the section?

Mr. LEVER. If the Chair will permit me, I shall make a brief statement. I made a statement in general debate that I would be as liberal as possible under the five-minute consideration of the bill. I have tried to be as liberal as a man can be. We have spent three hours and a half on this one section, and I trust that gentlemen will not force me to do that which I have never done in this House, and that is to move to close debate on a proposition. It does seem to me, however, that debate on this proposition is practically exhausted.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Do I understand that debate is to be confined to the discussion of the amendment?

Mr. LEVER. It ought to be.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is the gentleman's understanding, and the other kind of debate will be out of order.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Michigan will not start to apply that rule to this side when I have been invited by my good friend from Pennsylvania to reply to his speech, and it seems to me that ought to constitute an exception.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I say that I did not anticipate that my melodious friend had been asked to be heard, or anything of the kind.

Mr. HEFLIN. I just want to respond to the general clamor. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, to the fact that Members have requested an aggregate of 38 minutes of time.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we can not accommodate all gentlemen, I move to close debate on this section at this time and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] has offered an amendment and is entitled to five minutes before debate can be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota for five minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment strikes out the provisions of section 2 which relate to the issuing of a subpœna to anyone, which provisions are very drastic and very objectionable. As a substitute I have taken the Army bill provision, which authorizes the President to utilize all the State officers and local officers and require them to furnish information. The reason that this idea appeals to me is that recently when the excitement about the amount of crops that should be planted was general I received newspapers from home, and they showed that they had a complete organization in their several counties for furnishing information—the agricultural college, farmers' club, and the county agents made public the information as to who had seed to spare in order that there should be no idle land; that they had so many bushels of barley, so many of wheat, so many of potatoes, and so much on hand, and all kinds of information. This information is easy to obtain, and what is the use of sending out agents and clerks from Washington to make reports to be filed by hundreds and thousands, when nobody would ever read them. If the President uses the authority similar to that granted him under the Army bill requiring the local officers to furnish information, it will be easily gained.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. COX. Could not the President utilize the rural route carriers and get the information?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; he could get the information through the rural mail carriers.

This provision of the Army bill was drawn with a view to getting the information in regard to the selective draft, and I have simply changed it so as to make it applicable to this subject of inquiry about the crops. What is the use of creating thousands of new clerkships and officers throughout the land when the country is patriotic and willing, and every rural carrier, every postmaster, every county officer, every county agent, every agricultural school, every professor in a high school is ready to cooperate with the Government in furnishing the information? There is no danger that they will not find out nearly all that there is to be found out, and what is the use of putting in here a provision making such drastic law as this, that the Department of Agriculture, not a judicial department of the Government, shall issue subpœnas, and providing a penalty of $5,000? A man might be served with a subpœna who is busy on a farm. He would have to leave his farm in order to answer the subpœna. It is a very objectionable provision, and you can get better and more information and cheaper information by simply adapting the clause in the Army bill to this situation.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from Minnesota to have all of these different officials serve without compensation?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly. It is a war emergency. They will be glad to give you all of the information about the crops in my county free.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is it not a fact that through the present Bureau of Crop Estimates the Government is able to get astonishingly correct information in advance? For instance, it is stated by the chief of that bureau in the Department of Agriculture that their advance estimate of the cotton crop for 1914 was afterwards proven to have been within 1 per cent of correct, and in 1915 within three-quarters of 1 per cent of correct, and their estimate of the 1915 rice crop, which at the time it was issued was criticized as being 10 per cent too large, was later found to be within one-quarter of 1 per cent correct. These are cited by the head of that bureau of the Department of Agriculture as illustrations of how well the crop-reporting system operates. All the staple crops are the subjects of similar forecasts based upon facilities and authorities which the department already has, and the success of the work of that bureau seem to seriously discount the need of our appropriating $7,000,000 for a more elaborate system that will give more jobs but no better results.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute in which to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no doubt that the department can secure information already to a very astonishingly accurate degree, but the gentleman from South Carolina, in his opening remarks the other day on a similar bill, said that Dr. Brand, of the Department of Agriculture, has found one instance where the information that he desired was not obtainable, and for that reason he wanted the imposition of this obligation upon the part of the United States to support this army of officeholders and issue these subpœnas and put people in jail, and take them away from their daily toil, for the reason that Dr. Brand, in his experience of years in carrying on this work which he is in charge of—the Bureau of Markets—has found one instance where the information was not reliable. That is the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina when he opened the consideration of the bill the other day. I can see no reason why the Department of Agriculture can not get all of the information it wants in a similar manner to the manner in which the information is obtained under the Army bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to be heard upon the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to be heard on the point of order. What is the point of order?

Mr. LEVER. That it is not germane to this section or to the bill itself.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Did not the Chair decide the point of order before the extension of one minute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did, but the Chair will hear the gentleman upon the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. The part of the section which I desire to strike out is as follows:

For the purposes of this section the Secretary of Agriculture, and his agents duly authorized therefor, may compel the attendance at any designated place of witnesses from any part of the United States, the giving of testimony, oral or in writing, under oath or otherwise, the production of books, letters, papers, or documents, and the submission of reports; may sign, issue, and serve subpœnas; and may enter, on any business day during the usual hours of business, any place, including any structure, vessel, vehicle, or other premises except a dwelling house actually occupied exclusively as such. Any person who, in violation of any requirement made pursuant to this section, willfully fails or refuses to obey any subpœna, to answer any question, or to submit any book, letter, paper, document, or report, or knowingly makes any false or misleading answer or report, or willfully conceals or withholds any information, or any person who willfully obstructs or hinders the Secretary of Agriculture or any of his duly authorized agents in the performance of any duty under this section, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both. Witnesses summoned in pursuance of this section shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

That is, this simply makes it the duty of local officers to furnish the information which they threaten to get under penalty of imprisonment. It seems to me that the amendment is germane and proper. It is a better section than the section the gentleman has in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that section 3 authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to do certain things, and the gentleman's amendment authorizes the President of the United States to do certain things, and the attention of the Chair has also been called to the provision here in the rules, that one individual proposition may not always be amended by another individual proposition. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this bill does confer authority upon the President of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Not this section. The gentleman offers it to section 3.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then I want to reoffer the amendment and to strike out of it "the President of the United States," wherever it occurs, and to insert "the Secretary of Agriculture."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained to the amendment as offered.

Mr. LEVER. And I make the point of order that the amendment the gentleman has suggested is still subject to the point of order. I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. What became of the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was sustained.

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent the point of order is withdrawn and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEENERSON) there were—ayes 29, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON: Page 3, line 12, after amendments adopted insert a new section as follows:

"That whoever shall buy or sell on any board of trade, chamber of commerce, or exchange, in which any produce shipped in interstate commerce is purchased or sold, any wheat, corn, oats, or other food products on a margin intending that no delivery thereof shall be made, but with the intent that the same shall be settled for as a speculative margin, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more that three years, or both, in the discretion of the court. That upon a prosecution for such offense it shall only be necessary for the prosecution to show, in order to make a prima facie case, that such seller was not a grower or producer or owner at the time of such sale, of such grain or produce and that the purchaser or buyer purchased the same on a margin of less than 50 per cent, and upon such showing the burden of proof shall be shifted to the seller or purchaser to show a good faith transaction."

During the reading of the amendment the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is clearly subject to a point of order. Would not the gentleman be satisfied to have it printed in the RECORD and let me make the point of order?

Mr. DILLON. I would like to say something on it. It is very important.

Mr. LEVER. I know it is; but it is coming in another bill, and the less we talk on it the quicker we will get to the other bill.

Mr. DILLON. I have not consumed any time. I would like to have a little time on this.

Mr. LEVER. Go ahead.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] is recognized.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that all the criminal laws upon our statute books should be enforced. If you will enact this amendment into law and enforce it, you will do more in six months in reducing the high cost of living than you will in 10 years of investigation. I want to call attention to a few facts.

In 1912 there were only 36,000,000 bushels of wheat in the Chicago markets. But on the 28th of July, 1914, in one day they sold upon that market 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. An obscure trader at that time in five minutes made $25,000.

Again, in 1905 the difference in May wheat at the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce between high and low was 65 cents a bushel. During the same month upon the Chicago Chamber of Commerce the difference in May wheat between high and low was 38½ cents a bushel.

During the Minnesota legislative investigation in 1913 it was disclosed that there was one commission house that was under an expense of $300 a day. Who pays this expense? The consumer. There were 32 commission houses engaged in business in Minneapolis in 1911 whose total expenses amounted to $519,000, and in 1912 they were $443,000. The expenses of 100 commission houses in that city ran up to $1,400,000. Who pays for it? The consumer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the way to stop this gambling in wheat is under the criminal section of our statutes. It will be effective if you will enforce the law. It ought to be stopped. Everyone knows it ought to be stopped. And I am surprised that the chairman of this committee insists on making a point of order against this amendment, which will do the business in place of investigation. The Federal Trade Commission recently investigated the print-paper industry in this country for nine months. What did it amount to? A good live attorney could take a grand jury, under the Federal statutes, and in six months could do more than you could by investigation for 10 or 20 years.

While you are investigating, the gambling in the wheat markets of Chicago and Minneapolis goes on. If you want to give the farmers something worth while, give them a prosecution of those people who are robbing the consumer and the producer, and you will thus make your work effective.

I might call your attention to some of the provisions contained in the rules and regulations of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis. I call your attention to section 10 of rule 8, in which the membership of that organization have agreed among themselves to fix prices upon that market. The language is clear and positive. There is no evading it. I have called this to the attention of the legal department of the Government, asking that they investigate the facts and commence criminal proceedings, but nothing has been done.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that this section of the rules be made a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the section referred to:

Every member of this association, and every person, firm, and corporation admitted to trade or to do business therein, hereafter buying directly or indirectly for his, their, or its own account or otherwise any grain or seeds dealt in upon this exchange in carload lots, on track at country points, for shipment to Minneapolis, or buying any of the same to be delivered at Minneapolis, shall make their bids, offers, and purchases therefor on the basis of the Minneapolis market values, less commission, or a profit at least equal to the established rates of commission on said grain or seeds; and in addition such bids, offers, or purchases shall be made subject to the usual and the same charges of this association, to include, and they shall include, switching, inspection, weighing, freight—if a "delivered" bid and freight on dockage if a "track" bid—interest on advances, and all other charges according to the rules of this association the same as if said grain or seeds were handled on commission through said association; and they shall render an account to the seller for all such purchases, including said charges separately stated in detail; and any person, firm, or corporation who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be liable and subject to the same penalties as are provided in section 11 of rule 8 and section 7 of rule 4 of the general rules of this association.

Mr. DILLON. Under this rule the value of every carload of grain is fixed. The individuality of the seller and purchaser is eliminated, the combination acts for them, makes the price, and enforces its mandates by its rules, thus are the antitrust statutes violated with impunity.

Ninety-nine per cent of the transactions in the pit are never consummated by actual delivery. The speculators, by concert of action in the different markets, often throw on the market immense hedging orders, which must of necessity depress the market. If the buying orders are numerous, the price will necessarily go up. If the selling orders are heavy, the price will of necessity go down.

The grain producers usually sell their grain as soon as it is harvested, and it thus passes out of the hands of the producers into the hands of the speculators, and remains there until it finally reaches the consuming public. The distribution goes on while values rise and fall during the period of speculation. The producer is not carrying the risk of distribution, nor is the consumer. They have turned the job over to the speculators, who have assumed the burden for compensation, and during the period of distribution the gambling on the risk goes on.

The speculators relieve everybody from the hazards of distribution except their own victims. These operators will tell you that everyone has the right to hedge; that it is an insurance that the banks will accept as security, but they fail to inform us about the other fellow, who buys the hedging contracts for speculative purposes.

It must be admitted that every deal in futures where no intent to deliver exists must register its effect upon the cash price of grain. The cash price responds to the bidding on futures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds suitable for the production of food or feed crops, he is authorized to purchase, grow, or otherwise procure such seeds, to store them, and to furnish them, by sale or otherwise to farmers on credit or other terms at cost, including the expense of packing and transportation. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal any such seeds to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture in such quantities, at such times, and at such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable. Upon failure of the person to comply with such requirement the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to requisition and take possession of such seeds and to pay for them at the price so determined. If the price so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid the amount prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation for such seeds, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with furnishing seeds to farmers under this section may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the committee amendments printed in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

First committee amendment: Page 4, line 4, after the word "paid," insert the words "for such seeds on delivery."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question. Is this a jurisdiction conferred on the United States court regardless of the amount involved? Suppose at my place, 115 miles from where the United States court is held, a man was offered and paid only $1.50 per bushel for 100 bushels of wheat, and he thought he ought to have been paid $2 per bushel, and he wanted $50 more. Would he have to go 115 miles to sue and hire an attorney or lose the $50, regardless of the amount involved?

Mr. LEVER. That is true. That is written in the bill.

Mr. SWITZER. Does not the gentleman think that is a denial of justice?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I have not control of any time.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman is supposing a case that would never happen on earth.

Mr. SWITZER. I do not know. I am trying to find out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 8, after the word "seed," strike out the words "in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code," and insert "and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment that I sent up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 18, strike out the words "or otherwise" and the comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, that is all that the committee has.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: On page 4, at the end of section 4, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for nitrate of soda necessary for the production of food or feed crops he is authorized to purchase such nitrate of soda, store it, and sell it to the farmers at cost, including transportation and all other expenses, such cost price to be payable in advance. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal a supply of nitrate of soda to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture in such quantities, at such times, and at such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable. Upon failure of the person to comply with such requirement the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to requisition and take possession of such nitrate of soda and pay for it at the price so determined. If the price so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid for such nitrate of soda on delivery the amount prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation for such nitrate of soda; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the Secretary of the Navy or any other agency of the Government, and for such purpose there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000. Any moneys received by the United States from the sale of nitrate of soda to farmers under this section may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment that it is not germane.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that the offering of this amendment as a separate section would preclude an amendment to section 4 now under consideration? For instance, a motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that it will not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think if we proceed with the consideration of a new section, it would preclude the consideration of any amendment to section 4 which has just been read. I therefore make the point of order that the amendment is not in order at this time, because opportunity has not been given to Members to offer amendments to section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that if anybody desires to offer an amendment to the section of the bill, he would be entitled to the preference.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is correct, and therefore I will withdraw the amendment and offer it later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAYBURN: Amend by adding at the end of line 20, page 3, the following: "except seeds in the hands of the producer thereof."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CARAWAY rose.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman intend to have the amendment offered at the place indicated? It does not seem to dovetail with the text.

Mr. RAYBURN. It reads this way: "except the actual producer of the seed."

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That was not the language read.

Mr. STAFFORD. The way it read was: "except seeds in the hands of the producer thereof." I ask that the amendment may again be reported, so as to conform to the idea of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. The amendment, as I offered it, reads this way: "That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person except the producer"—

The CHAIRMAN. How does the gentleman wish to modify his amendment?

Mr. RAYBURN. I want to modify it so that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person except the actual producer thereof.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion? I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that the amendment would be better placed after the word "seeds," in line 21, to insert the words "except the producer thereof."

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it should come after the word "person."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAYBURN: Amend by adding, at the end of line 20, the following: "except the producer thereof," so that the lines will read: "The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person except the producer thereof having at his disposal any such seeds," etc.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not mean the producer of the person. That is the way it reads.

Mr. KINKAID. It would be better to come in after the word "seeds."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I thought I had time on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will be recognized——

Mr. STAFFORD. You can not take the gentleman off the floor. He has been recognized to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has the floor if he insists on it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Really I think all the section after the word "transportation" should be stricken out. Then it would go as far as most of us feel we ought to go, and a little further, as far as I am individually concerned. But I have discussed this matter with several members of the Committee on Agriculture, and to each and every one of them my objection has been that I did not think the Secretary of Agriculture, or any little fellow appointed by him, ought to go over this country to the farmers and actual producers of seeds and take them away from those actual producers at a wholly arbitrary price set by the Secretary of Agriculture, and they have said it was not the intention, of course, and that he would not do a thing like that.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Texas will yield, I have consulted members of the committee on both sides, and I do not think there is really any objection to this amendment, because I think it is in the minds of the members of the committee that the Secretary of Agriculture would not do such a foolish thing anyhow.

I ask for a vote.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to offer a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Gentlemen have said they did not oppose my amendment, but I think it ought to be made definite in the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Ought not the gentleman to put his amendment after the word "seeds," in line 21?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it is all right where it is, but I ask unanimous consent to transpose the amendment to follow the word "seeds," in line 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. The Clerk will report it as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. RAYBURN: Page 3, line 21, after the word "seeds" insert the words "except the producer thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. LEVER. I was hoping that by accepting this we might save debate on it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not want you to accept it. I want to offer a substitute for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CARAWAY offers the following substitute: Page 3, line 21, after the word "seeds" add the words "for sale."

Mr. ANDERSON. I make a point of order that that is not a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. It is a separate amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is a substitute for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think the point of order is well taken. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment of Mr. RAYBURN was agreed to.

Mr. CARAWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr CARAWAY: Page 3, line 21, after the word "seeds" insert the words "for sale."

Mr. MANN. No; has a contract to sell and deliver seed; of course he could break his contract. He has it not only at his disposal, but he has it for sale, and he was going to sell it. The most of the seed is raised that way.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to ask my friend whether he thinks his statement that seed is raised for seed purposes and subject to a contract of sale applies to wheat. Ordinarily wheat is not raised for seed specifically. A man may have a high grade of wheat, and his neighbors may like that particular variety and want to buy it for seed, but he does not grow the crop for seed.

Mr. MANN. My distinguished friend from Michigan in his early youth was raised on a farm.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I was; and I have got the farm now.

Mr. MANN. And he buys his seed from the fellow who has raised the seed with extra care for that purpose. I have an interest in a farm where we raise grain in this way.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Seed growers.

Mr. MANN. No; it is a large farm, and we raise quantities of grain, and some of it is raised for seed. It is planted for seed.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is it not true that a large crop is grown, say, of wheat, and it may be of such a good variety that people learn of it and want to buy some for seed, but it is not originally grown for seed?

Mr. MANN. A large quantity is grown for the express purpose of using it for seed. If it does not turn out well, they do not use it for seed. There are a lot of seed growers throughout the country who make a specialty of farm seeds. It is not so much in wheat and corn as it is in peas and beans and the like.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Oh, I agree with the gentleman as to those.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this entire question of the conservation of our food supply, there enters an important element which, in my judgment, has not received the attention and consideration that it deserves, namely, that of farm help. To me this is almost as important as any question we are obliged to face, and it is, indeed, doubtful if one-half the crops that are planted in the East will receive proper attention or even be harvested in the fall. As agriculturists, we are deteriorating because the farmer does not receive all the encouragement he needs. If he raises wheat or corn he is at the mercy of the gambling element of the Chicago Board of Trade; in raising general crops he is at the mercy of the commission man. In many instances the truck gardener in my State; yes, and the fruit grower of Florida, does not get much beyond the cost of freight and packages on goods shipped to Boston, we will say, because the commission man takes what he figures is necessary to supply the trade and maintain prices; and a large or small dealer dare not make an effort to buy direct, fearing the penalty of a ban from the commission man. The country is overridden with combinations, and irrespective of laws that are passed to prevent such conditions loopholes are found whereby all obstacles can be overcome without treading across the danger line. [Applause.]

Government control of prices and conditions will serve in a measure to keep combinations in restraint. There are worse crooks at large than are in the jails, particularly among those who are dictating exorbitant prices on foodstuffs. Though flour is selling at $16 a barrel, I very much doubt if any flour made in the past few months was produced from wheat that cost the miller more than $1.30 a bushel. The parasites who have boosted the prices of wheat have afforded the miller an excuse to increase the price of flour to conform with figures that represent in the main figures only and not a delivery of the actual wheat itself.

The population of the world has decreased considerably the past three years, and if before the war we had an oversupply of foodstuffs every year, why must we run so short during the coming year, with fewer people to feed?

The coal question, as we all realize, will be one which will tax the ingenuity of the best brains of the land. Take Massachusetts for instance. There isn't the slightest doubt in my mind but that four-fifths of the output in Boston alone is controlled by one corporation, and unless the right kind of a scare is thrown into that same corporation there will be untold suffering among the poor of my city during the coming year.

Again, I repeat that Government control of prices and conditions is necessary at once to keep these combinations in restraint, and I want to see legislation enacted now that will bring this about. [Applause.]

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. In line 21, page 3, the word "disposal" is used. Does the gentleman understand that that word means that he has it for sale or that he merely had it in his possession and under his control?

Mr. LEVER. That he has it for sale.

Mr. CARAWAY. If that is the proper construction, then there is no need of my amendment. I though it meant also that it was in his control and that he had authority over it. But the suggestion has been made that "disposal" means for sale.

Mr. LEVER. That is the construction I put upon it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. In regard to the word "him" in line 24, page 3, where it says "such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable," who does "him" refer to—the man who has the seed or the Secretary of Agriculture? If it is a doubtful construction, it ought to be made clear by inserting "the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. LEVER. It refers to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose it does, but it is doubtful.

Mr. LEVER. The words "Secretary of Agriculture" just precedes it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Reading the whole sentence, it does not appear clear to whom it refers.

Mr. LEVER. I think the language following is sufficient to make it clear.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I would like some information from the gentleman from South Carolina as to the construction of the bill in this particular. Suppose the Secretary of Agriculture or one of his agents should require the owner of seeds of some kind to deliver them up, the Secretary taking them at his price when the owner of the seeds himself should desire to plant those identical seeds for the identical purpose for which the Secretary was going to use them. Does the gentleman think that would be proper and right? Ought there not to be some exception or qualification in cases where the farmer has the seeds that he himself is going to plant for the purpose of producing crops? Will you rob Peter to pay Paul?

Mr. LEVER. The whole purpose of this section is to undertake to stimulate and increase production of foodstuffs. Certainly the Secretary of Agriculture would not be so asinine as to take seed from one farmer to give to another farmer.

Mr. KINKAID. The Secretary of Agriculture would not be so absurd, but how are you to regulate the action of the agent representatives of the great Department of Agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. I hardly think the Secretary would choose any agent foolish enough to do such an absurd thing.

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; but the laws ought not to permit a foolish thing to be done.

Mr. LEVER. I would call the attention of the gentleman to another fact. The Secretary of Agriculture is the only person authorized in this section to do the thing that the gentleman fears might be done. I think it is safeguarded in that respect. I do not think there is a particle of danger of that.

Mr. KINKAID. There may not be danger, but I think it is a little dangerous to be so unrestricted.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that that could be obviated if the gentleman thinks it is necessary to obviate it by inserting after the word "reasonable," in line 24, the words "Provided, however, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall not make such requirements in relation to seed needed by the producer thereof for seed."

Mr. LEVER. I think it would be a legislative absurdity.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It strikes me so, also.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I call the attention of the gentleman to the amendment already adopted that will prohibit the Secretary from taking any of these seeds from the hands of the producer.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the pending section. I move to strike out all of section 4 following the word "transportation," at the end of the first sentence in line 19, page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Strike out all of section 4 following the word "transportation," in line 19, page 3, down to and including the word "controversies," in line 12, page 4.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think we ought to limit it at this time. This is one of the most important sections of the bill. The last section took an hour or two and is not nearly so important.

Mr. LEVER. Then I suggest we make it 15 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will make the limit a little longer than that, and then say that after this section is disposed of the committee will rise.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to get as far as the appropriating section of the bill to-night.

Mr. MANN. I would like to help the gentleman, but I think we can get through the bill to-morrow, and that is all that we can do anyway.

Mr. LEVER. Then I suggest that we close debate in 25 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we will be making headway if we do not close debate at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman does not want over 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know how long I want. This is an important provision relating to the constitutionality of the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into this practice.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the request of the gentleman refer to everything in connection with the section?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes; the gentleman from Wisconsin to have 10 minutes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota 5 minutes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Make it 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman couple with that an agreement that the committee rise after that?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I would like very much to read down to the appropriating section of the bill, section 9. I do not think there will be any controversy about the intervening sections.

Mr. HAUGEN. And then rise?

Mr. LEVER. We might do that. I suggest that the committee rise when we get to the appropriating section, section 9 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman a question, reserving the right to object. On lines 4 and 5, page 4, we find the language "shall be paid for such seeds on delivery." The section provides for the seizure by the Government where they do not agree on a price. Ought not the words "or seizure" be inserted?

Mr. LEVER. I will be glad to think about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Wisconsin proceeds, I wish that he would state to us exactly what he proposes in his amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in response to the request of the gentleman from Michigan I will state that my amendment is to strike out all of the first paragraph in section 4 following the word "transportation," in line 19, on page 3. That strikes out all that part which gives authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seed from people against their will and requisition such seed for the benefit of other private parties.

I question very seriously whether even under the war powers of the Constitution we have any right whatever to appropriate the property of another person to be used for the benefit of another private party. In fact, my reading of the decisions of the Supreme Court does not show an instance which supports the right of the Government even in war time under the powers of eminent domain to take the property of a private individual, as is purposed in this section, and transfer it to another person, even though it agrees to pay him a fair and reasonable value.

It may be apocryphal to advance in consideration of any of these measures a constitutional argument, and yet I am going to venture the citation of a case which I think is applicable to the question under consideration, a case I had occasion to cite when we were considering the right to appropriate the property of individuals in interned steamers in this country a few days ago, without making provision for compensating them. It is the case of the United States v. Russell (13 Wall., p. 628). There Justice Clifford uses language which limits the right in war times—and this was a cases arising out of the appropriation, or, rather, the use of steamers plying on the Mississippi River for the use of the armed forces of the United States—of the Government under those conditions to appropriate private property for its use. True it did not involve the very question presented here, yet the language used by Justice Clifford in deciding that case and which has been referred to approvingly on three or four occasions since in decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, shows that the Government has only the right to use this property in case it is imperatively necessary. It must be shown that it is imperatively necessary, not for the use of some private person, but for the use of the Government.

The power under this section is not limited to the appropriation of the property, namely, the seeds of private persons, for the use of the Government, but it is purposed to use such seeds for the use of other private persons—for the general welfare, perhaps, of the country generally. I call the attention of the committee to the following language used by Justice Clifford in deciding the case:

> Where such an extraordinary and unforeseen emergency occurs in the public service in time of war no doubt is entertained that the power of the Government is ample to supply for the moment the public wants in that way to the extent of the immediate public exigency, but the public danger must be—

And I call the attention of the committee to this language especially—> but the public danger must be immediate, imminent, and impending, and the emergency in the public service must be extreme and imperative, and such as will not admit of delay or a resort to any other source of supply.

He goes on:

> Exigencies of the kind do arise in time of war or impending public danger, but it is the emergency, as was said by a great magistrate, that gives the right, and it is clear that the emergency must be shown to exist before the taking can be justified. Such a justification may be shown, and when shown the rule is well settled that the officer taking private property for such a purpose, if the emergency is fully proved, is not a trespasser, and that the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner.

Further on he says:

> Such a taking of private property by the Government, when the emergency of the public service in time of war or impending public danger is too urgent to admit of delay, is everywhere regarded as justified, if the necessity for the use of the property is imperative and immediate, and the danger, as heretofore described, is impending—

And further on—

> Private rights, under such extreme and imperious circumstances, must give way for the time to the public good, but the Government must make full restitution for the sacrifice.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LENROOT. It is a very important point which the gentleman is discussing. I want to ask him whether he distinguishes between the taking of private property by some subordinate officer of the Government without authority of law and the exercising of the right of eminent domain by express legislative authority?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do distinguish between those two cases, but under the war powers of the Constitution the military authorities have the right to go in and utilize property of private individuals for purposes of war. But the Government of the United States has not the right to appropriate private property for the benefit of other individuals; at least I can find no decision to that effect; though I can find, I may say, writers on constitutional law that defend the principle that during war times the Constitution is lifted entirely, and that there are no restraints whatsoever imposed upon the Government in the exercise of any powers under the so-called war powers.

I was surprised to find such an extreme and radical proposal advanced by the teacher of constitutional law in the Harvard Law School, namely, that the restriction of the Constitution on the exercise of powers by Congress was virtually lifted during war time. And yet the amendment to the Constitution which says that private property shall not be taken without due process of law are as applicable in war times as during times of peace so far as the appropriation of private property for the benefit and use of other persons.

It is strange, if such arbitrary power exists, that no decision, so far as I have been able to discover, has been rendered by the Supreme Court justifying the right of the Government to appropriate private property for the benefit of other private individuals. I would not question the premise of my colleague that the Government has the right to appropriate private property of individuals for the use of the Government itself, or of any agency of the Government, such as the Army or the Navy. That is certainly a justification of the governmental powers to meet war conditions. But for us here under the guise of war power to say that the Government can come in and take my property for the use of some other private person, and which may not be used directly for the benefit of the Government, is going, I believe, beyond the constitutional prerogative of the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not the test, however, whether or not it is a public purpose? And if it be a public purpose it need not necessarily be for the use of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think it is public use.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not that the test, whether or not it is for a public purpose?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it must be more than the public purpose; I think it must be for the benefit of the Government itself, as a Government, and not merely for the general welfare. Otherwise we might just as well eliminate the restrictions of the Constitution during war time and say there are no constitutional limitations on the exercise of powers by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought I would have occasion for more time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am not certain that I shall care to occupy the whole five minutes. This section 4 of this bill is a very remarkable piece of phraseology. I do not wish that anything I shall say shall be construed as any reflection on the committee or on its capacity to express in language that which it means to do, but I do think that this section 4 is a very loosely constructed piece of legislation, only surpassed by section 5 of this act.

Every Member of this House wants to do something in the accomplishment of conservation of the existing food supply of the land and to aid in increasing the food supply of the land. I think, for one, that the suggestions made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] here on the floor a few hours ago are worth more than all the items contained in this bill put together. Evidently those who drew this bill were not members of the committee. This is one of those hand-made pieces of legislation——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Handed down to us——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; handed down to us from some source, and I do not blame any man for not wanting to have his name attached to the bill. [Laughter.] It would not redound very much to his credit.

Evidently in the minds of the committee, or at least of the ones who drafted the bill, we should do something to provide the farmers of the country with seed, very likely with kinds of seed they do not now have, very likely with seeds in quantities that they themselves are not able to procure. But does this accomplish that purpose in any sense of the term? It does provide that within a restricted area—whatever that means I do not know, and I have not heard anybody yet who seems to know—whenever there is existing need in a restricted area, the Government can furnish seeds to persons in that restricted area. What is the meaning of the word "need"?

Now, I want to say a word or two in reference to that which has been stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and while my talk is general it has one object in view. I think this paragraph ought to be entirely rewritten, taken out completely as it stands and entirely rewritten and made to mean something, in order that something definite may be accomplished.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin who has just spoken that there does not reside in Congress the power to grant to the Secretary of Agriculture or the President the authority to reach out and take grain in the possession of citizens of this country and pay them a reasonable price therefor and to utilize those grains for seed, providing that an exigency exists making that for the public welfare. If the Government can not do that, it fails in the fundamental reasons for its existence, namely, to perform those things which individuals can not themselves do but which the individuals as a whole need to have done. The Constitution of the United States, under the powers and authorities granted by it to the legislative body of the country, authorizes, I think, just exactly such a thing.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I wanted to ask the gentleman, if the Government undertook to confiscate or condemn the property now, would it not be an entirely new procedure in the history of the United States where it can take property from any person and deliver it to another individual?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. You mean, to act under this bill?

Mr. ROSE. To take either real estate or personal property.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota Of course the Government can not do that except for public purposes.

Mr. ROSE. Would it not be an entirely new procedure in the history of the United States to do it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It would be an entirely new proceeding in peace times. Our Government, however, has done that very thing without any legislative action. During the wars that we have had the armies in the field have always taken the things that they need to feed their troops, to feed their horses, to enable them to carry on their campaigns. Sometimes they paid for those things, and sometimes not. They ought to have been paid for. But if a man from whom it is taken is not in amity with the United States—that was the old law, and of course it is the law yet—he will receive no compensation for it, although that person is a citizen of the United States and protected by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Was it not an exigency, for the use of the soldiers?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Could they do it for planting purposes?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am coming to that. It has got to be shown that an exigency exists, and not merely a possible benefit to the whole people of the country to take this important and high-handed action. An exigency must really exist. It does exist. The world has been at war for three years. We know that the food supplies of the various countries of the world are about exhausted. We know that our allies, engaged with us in a stupendous undertaking, are looking to the United States for food. If that food does not go to our allies our cruse is probably lost. By properly framing the legislation we can say that an exigency does exist, and we can then specifically authorize the Government to take this action. But I do not think this language does it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 4, after line 12, strike out lines 13 to 19, inclusive.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment being read for information. Of course, it is not in order, with another amendment pending.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let it stand at that. That is what I am doing it for now. I want to discuss it. It will follow the other amendment in regular course.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this may be a small matter, and yet it may be a serious one. I have offered the amendment to invite the attention of the Chair and the Members of the House to it. It may be that a point of order would lie against this paragraph. I am not sure. It proposes rather a new feature in an agricultural bill, the waiving of the rights of Congress to pass upon appropriations. The Secretary of Agriculture acquires certain funds, due to appropriations made by Congress in this bill, if the bill passes, and instead of turning those funds into the Treasury he expends them as he sees fit, and expends them over and over again until the fund is exhausted, or, if there is anything left, he turns it into the Treasury when he sees fit. Now, that is a dangerous practice, and one that ought not to be lightly conferred upon any of the departments of the Government. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, "but no appropriation of money for that purpose shall be for a longer time than two years." Now, we are at war, and this is a war bill, but the constitutional provision still stands that appropriations made by Congress shall not be for a longer period than two years. Yet this revolving proposition may go on indefinitely. It takes out of the hands of Congress during the two years money that ought to be turned into the Treasury and leaves it with the departmental officers.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that up to last year this same provision applied to our insular stations, like the stations in Porto Rico and Guam, and so on.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But this is its first appearance in an agricultural bill.

Mr. LEVER. And I am reminded also that this same provision practically applies to the reclamation act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But is it not a fact that it takes the money out of the hands of Congress, or out of the Treasury, for a period exceeding two years, if the emergency lasts that long?

Mr. LEVER. I am not sure about that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Section 10 of this bill, which is a very peculiar section, provides that the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed. When? In three years? In five years? "The date of which shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the date when this act shall cease to be in effect shall not be later than one year after the termination of the present war between the United States and Germany." That may be five years from now. Yet this fund, because it is a revolving fund, remains until the emergency is over. The Secretary of Agriculture may change. He may change once or twice before this fund is finally disposed of in this way. It is going to be a floating balance in his hands, taken entirely away from the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to direct the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to the fact that the limitation that money shall not be appropriated for a longer term than two years is a limitation upon money appropriated to raise and support armies. It is not a limitation upon appropriations for any other purpose. The only limitation upon appropriations for general purposes is that they shall be made in consequence of a law of Congress. I think it is a debatable question whether the provision for a revolving fund comes within the general provision that appropriation shall be made in consequence of law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman contend this is not a war bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. I contend that the appropriation to which the gentleman has directed attention is not an appropriation to raise and support an army.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it is for the purpose "of carrying on the war with Germany."

Mr. LEVER. That is a very different thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Arkansas is entitled to recognition.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas may be transferred to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I think the view of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is not exactly right. I gathered from his remarks that he believed the Secretary would be authorized to furnish seed to individuals here and there throughout the United States.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I did not intend to say that, and did not intend to imply anything of that kind. If I said that, it was unintentional.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The section provides that this is to be operative in case there is "a special need in any restricted area for seeds." If this means anything, it means that there may be this year found somewhere in the United States an area wherein there may be a crop failure. There may be one area, or there may be more than one. If that develops anywhere in the United States during this crop year, then it will be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to provide seeds which will be available and which can be gathered during the fall months to take care of the emergency that will thus be created. It is not a new thing for crops to fail on account of drouth, hail, or other causes. If very small areas are struck by hail, the seed can probably be furnished by neighbors. We must assume that the Secretary will use some discretion. But if conditions arise where it is plain certain areas will not be seeded unless the Government furnishes the seed on time, it is the part of wisdom to brace ourselves against such an emergency. The world's food reserves are very low. We must do everything possible to increase production throughout this war. This section is very important.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I said I did not know exactly what the bill meant by that word "need." Now the gentleman himself has mentioned a need that might exist, namely, a restricted area where the crop preceding had failed. I can name a dozen. Here is an area that has no seed at all. It may be because it is of an inferior kind. That would be a need. Another need would be where the year before they had grown nothing but potatoes, and they wanted to grow wheat. Now, which of the needs will the Secretary be able to respond to?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. As far as I am concerned, I think the Secretary should be authorized in his discretion to respond to any one of those needs, because the great need, as everybody admits now, is to raise as much grain for human food as possible not only during the year 1917 but during the year 1918, and this legislation has to do, as everyone admits, with the crop next year rather than the crop this year, as this year's crop is in.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. What right would the Government have to take 100 bushels of wheat from me and give it to Mr. Jones, or to take my corn and give it to Mr. Jones? That is for private use, and it is not a public use. Can the gentleman enlighten me?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman has introduced another question. I disagree with the gentleman. It seems to me that when we are equipping armies to be sent to France of a million men and perhaps more, who must be provided with food, it is a public purpose if we now authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to see to it that every single foot of ground available in the United States is put into crops next year.

Mr. DILLON. How can it be a public use if you take it from me and give it to Brown?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Because Brown will raise grain to be used to feed the armies of the United States.

Mr. DILLON. That is no public use; that is a private use.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman is welcome to his opinion.

Mr. DILLON. And it is in direct contravention of the provision of the Constitution.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is just as much a public use as when you take a piece of land by condemnation and use it to permit ingress and egress to land owned by another person. It is used only by one man but can be used by the public generally, and the public generally gets the benefit of it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think it is safe to say that if we had proposed an absolute appropriation here there would have been no objection to it; but because we are proposing to sell the grain and get the money back, create a revolving fund, have the money used two or three times, and finally come back into the Treasury of the United States, we find people objecting to it.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I would like to offer.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order that an amendment is already pending.

Mr. BOOHER. My amendment is to perfect the section.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understood that two amendments are pending—one by the gentleman from Wisconsin, who offers an amendment to page 3, and one by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was offered simply for information. The gentleman from Missouri will be recognized later.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, as I understand, is to perfect the section—the language that I move to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized to offer his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 5, after the word "delivery," insert the words "or seizure."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin and also the one later to be offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be adopted. As I caught the reading of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, I personally have no objection to it. That part of section 1 which the gentleman from Wisconsin proposes to strike out reads in part:

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal any such seeds to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture in such quantities, at such times, and at such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable. Upon failure of the person to comply with such requirement the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to requisition and take possession of such seeds and to pay for them at the price so determined.

I do not anticipate, Mr. Chairman, that the time will ever come when the Secretary of Agriculture will have to use the power conferred upon him by that language, but it is within the range of possibility that he would have to use that power. There is a great scarcity of seeds of certain kinds in certain portions of the country at this time. In my own part of the country it is almost impossible to get seed Irish potatoes and, in some sections, onion sets. In the extreme Northwest spring wheat is going to be reduced considerably because of the fact that there is a shortage in spring wheat seed. It may be that this shortage is due to the hoarding of the seeds. I do not know and do not make any accusations. It may be that this shortage is due to a combination of individuals engaged in the seed business withholding their products from the market demanding exorbitant prices—I do not know. But if such a condition should arise in the future this language authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture in the interest of the public good to requisition such seeds and make them available to the country in order to increase the food supply of the Nation.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have had reports from the farmers in Nebraska that they expect the price of winter wheat to be so high that it will embarrass them in planting a full crop next fall. So that the situation is going to be acute in Nebraska.

Mr. LEVER. This is to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to secure a reasonable quantity of seed for 1918. There was an area in my section of the country through which the flood swept last year, and we appropriated half a million dollars to help those people.

This year the production in that section of the country is going to be reduced largely for the reason that the farmers have neither the credit to buy nor the cash to get the seed. It is in that kind of situation that this fund would be used, and it would be of immense benefit to the country.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the good purpose that is intended, but the fear that I have is that once it gets abroad that the Government is in the business of furnishing seed the temptation to the farmers will be to sell at a good price and not keep back their own seed. I know in our country that frequently our farmers sell their cotton seed almost to the point of entirely disposing of what they have, and then have to rely on the oil men in the spring for their seed.

Mr. LEVER. We must take a chance on a reasonable exercise of these powers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk, which I offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Amend, on page 4, after line 12, by striking out lines 13 to 19, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with such State and local officials, and with such public and private agencies, or persons, as he finds necessary, and to make such rules and regulations and to issue such orders as are necessary effectively to carry out the preceding sections of this act.

Mr. HULBERT. I move to strike out the section, for the purpose of placing before the House for information the following telegrams and letters:

NEW YORK, May 22, 1917.

Representative MURRAY HULBERT,
Washington, D. C.:

Now is time to urge Senate and House committees to call Dr. Harvey W. Wiley into conference. He spoke here at Academy of Medicine last night and wants to enlighten committees on truths concerning war bread and whole-cereal food. He has a big and wonderful message and should be granted hearing. Bend all energies to force committees to confer with him. He can nail some of the falsehoods which have been spread in Washington and save this Nation from a heavy trial. Have wired CHANDLER.

ALFRED W. MCCANN.

MAY 23, 1917.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Will you be good enough to advise me if the committee, before the food-regulation bills are taken up in the House, will hear Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, for whose appearance before the committee I shall be glad to arrange.

Sincerely, yours, ——— ———.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1917.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Your letter of the 23d relative to having Dr. Wiley before my committee on the food-regulation bills is at hand, and in reply permit me to say that the hearings are now closed, and that we hope within the next 10 days to report the second bill to the House.

Very truly, A. F. LEVER.

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING MAGAZINE,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1917.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HULBERT: I am informed by Mr. Alfred W. McCann that you are interested in safeguarding the food products of this country by providing for a food administrator, of which I am heartily in favor. The proposed legislation creating the office of food administrator provides, among other things, for the mixing of flours. In my opinion this provision opens the door to unbridled adulteration. If the bill is changed so that all mixing of flours shall be made by the United States authorities it will, of course, not be so objectionable. If, however, the mixing of flours is permitted to the millers, it will be almost impossible to follow out the depreciation of the flour which they will endeavor to practice.

I also am interested in the milling of the whole cereals instead of a part of them for human food. I believe that the best and most wholesome bread and porridge, or mush, are made from the whole ground cereal from which nothing has been removed but the dirt. Statements have been made that whole-wheat flour, whole-corn meal, etc., will not keep. These statements I know to be contrary to the facts. The millers are in the habit of adding water to the grains they grind before the milling process takes place. They claim that this makes it possible for them to get a more perfect separation of the bran, which is most undesirable; but it also makes a flour that is more moist than it should be, and thus becomes an adulteration. If air ground wheat and corn are ground without moisture they make a flour or a meal which will keep almost indefinitely, as I have repeatedly demonstrated. If we could use the whole cereal in the making of breadstuffs we would add 33 per cent of the value to our cereal product for human food.

I am glad that you are interested in this problem, and I would be glad of an opportunity to go before the proper committee with exhibits to show the value of the whole-wheat and whole-corn rations and the danger of permitting the mixing of undesirable substances with them.

I am, sincerely,

H. W. WILEY.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the chairman to the language in lines 23 and 24, page 4, "and to issue such orders." That apparently related to section 6 of the bill as it was originally introduced. That has been stricken out, and there is no occasion for that language in this section.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I think that is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in lines 23 and 24, the language "and to issue such orders."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, lines 23 and 24, strike out the words "and to issue such orders."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. What is contemplated by cooperation with private persons? I thought that the policy was one that had been abandoned by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to debate this section to-night. My purpose was to rise, and if the gentleman will propound that question to-morrow I will be glad to answer it. There are several gentlemen who desire to offer amendments and have them pending.

Mr. NORTON. I will be very glad to have it go over.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, a rather long one, which I desire to offer and have pending, so that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment and have it printed in the RECORD, to be considered as pending. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SUMNERS: Amend the bill by inserting, after line 12, page 3 of the bill, another section, as follows:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to establish, at as early date as practicable, a food, food-material, and farm-produce exchange, with such branches thereof as may be necessary, in order to afford a medium through which the economic and systematic sale and distribution and conservation of food, food material, and farm products may be effected.

"In the operation of such exchange the Secretary of Agriculture, as far as practicable, shall cooperate with the several States and the various agencies therein which may be utilized, and may formulate plans and regulations for exchange of service between them and such exchange.

"It shall be the duty of each of the departments of the Government to furnish the Secretary of Agriculture with such statistics and data as they may acquire which would be useful in the operation of such exchange, and to render such other service in the sale and distribution of farm products through such exchange as it would be practicable to render.

"The Secretary of Agriculture, as rapidly and completely as practicable, shall establish and promulgate standards, not otherwise provided for by law, for foods, food material, and farm products and for the containers and packages in which foods, food material, and farm products are shipped.

"The Secretary of Agriculture shall keep advised, as nearly as practicable, with the details of the quantity, quality, location, and price at which held of foods, food materials, and farm products and the volume and location of demand in the United States and abroad and the price at which such foods, food material, and farm products may be sold and shall make such information available to the public and to producers and purchasers of such foods, food material, and farm products in such a way as to make it most useful in connection with current sales, and shall endeavor to procure the conservation and economic distribution of such foods, food material, and farm products in quantities proportionate to the requirement of the several sections, to the end that unnecessary charges upon distribution be eliminated, and commodities which now waste in the fields and congested markets after production be directed to points where they are needed for use or where they may be conserved.

"Those desiring to offer foods, food material, and farm products for sale through such exchange may do so by description or by grade or sample delivered to such exchange under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe, but all tenders to sell shall be for a definite quantity and quality: Provided, however, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to permit contracts for the sale of farm products to be made upon a basis grade, with the option to deliver other grades in fulfillment of such contract: Provided further, That no contracts for the sale of such farm products shall be made through said exchange permitting a delivery within a wider range of grades than the ordinary user of such product dealt in uses in the general conduct of his business wherein such products are used, nor upon any other delivery value difference than the commercial difference between the basis grade and the grade or grades delivered.

"The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require such deposits in money, bond, or other guaranty of compliance with the obligation to deliver according to tender or receive and pay according to offer, and to exercise such inspection and supervision as in his judgment may be necessary to insure compliance with the contracts made through such exchange and inspire general confidence that there will be such compliance.

"Any person making a contract through such exchange without the bona fide intention to deliver or to receive such products, as the case may be according to the terms of the contract made, or who makes a contract through such exchange for the purpose of enhancing or depressing the price of the commodity traded in, or who shall fraudulently pack, brand, tag, or label, or knowingly make false or fraudulent representations with regard to any commodity traded in through such exchange, or who shall knowingly make false returns to the owner thereof with reference to sales effected entirely or in part through such exchange, shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both.

"All information furnished by such exchange shall not be at a higher cost than that necessary to defray the expenses of transmission.

"No charges shall be made to individual producers or to producers' organizations for services rendered in effecting sales of products grown by them or by their members, as the case may be.

"The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to establish such rules and regulations governing transactions through said exchange and the service rendered by said exchange, including the designation of and use of brands, tags, or labels to facilitate and safeguard transactions had through such exchange, as in his discretion may be deemed necessary."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4188 and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

S. 2133. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes; and

S. 1816. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 14. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FIELDS indefinitely, on account of illness of his wife.

EXPLOSIVES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request of this morning, that upon the completion of the consideration of this bill the bill (H. R. 3932) relating to the storing of explosives in war times shall be in order, subject to appropriation bills and conference reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 3932 be made privileged, subject, however, to conference reports and things of that kind. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman had an understanding with the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to state that I have. This is satisfactory to Mr. SMALL.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I do not believe it will be possible for my colleague to get his bill through to-morrow, although it may be. Probably the deficiency bill will be reported to-morrow and taken up Monday, and that may take a couple of days. Wednesday is Memorial Day. A good many gentlemen are leaving the city now, expecting to stay away until after Memorial Day. I hope we will be able to reach some agreement about other matters so that it will not interfere with the gentlemen going away.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that can be arranged all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a message from the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to the Christian people of the Nation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[The matter referred to appears elsewhere in to-day's RECORD.]

MANUFACTURE OF DRUGS.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill, which I send to the desk. It has for its object to authorize the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy to manufacture certain drugs which may be protected by patent or trade-mark when, in his judgment, the health of the Army or of the Navy or of the public requires it. I do not care to interfere with the discussion of the pending bill, but I ask that it may lie on the table and during the day or on Monday I shall desire to speak briefly to the bill.

The bill (S. 2363) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy to manufacture for the use of the Army, Navy, or the people of the United States any drug, medicine, or other remedy or device which is protected by a patent or patents, trade-mark or trade-marks, and which can not be procured at a reasonable price within the United States, was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I introduce a bill and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 2364) to declare unlawful the purchase of supplies, articles, materials, munitions, or products for the Government from any person, firm, association, or corporation acting as the purchasing agent of the Government or from any person who is a member of any board, commission, council, committee, or subcommittee acting directly or in an advisory capacity relative to such purchases or from any firm, association, or corporation in which he is financially interested, and to make unlawful contracts with such persons, firms, associations, or corporations for the construction of buildings, ships, or other classes of buildings and construction work, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary as follows:

SEC. 3. Any person, firm, association, or corporation making a sale to or entering into an agreement with any officer or agent of the Government in violation of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not exceeding five years, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1786) to amend certain sections of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

RATES ON FOOD COMMODITIES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The resolution (S. Res. 73) was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the increased production of grain, fruits, vegetables, live stock and meat animals, poultry, and other raw food products is a matter of supreme importance to the country, in order that a sufficient supply may be produced for our domestic consumption and to meet the additional requirements imposed by the war, the feeding of our armies in the field and our allies abroad; and

Whereas there is now proposed an advance of 15 per cent in freight rates on these food commodities throughout the country: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be requested to proceed at once to ascertain and report to the Senate the effect which such advances in rates would have upon the cost of production and upon the cost to the consumer of these products.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 74) was read and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, authorized to have printed for its use 2,000 copies of the hearings before said committee on the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

THE FOOD SITUATION.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, not to have it read, an article appearing in the American Food Journal, by Secretary Houston, on the food situation of the country.

Without objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Food Journal.]

THE FOOD SITUATION OF THE COUNTRY.

[By D. F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture.]

There is nothing in the food situation of the country which justifies hysterical thinking or action. This is not a time for hysteria. Nor is this a time for the thought of the American people to be directed or dominated by those who have the interests of another country primarily at heart or any selfish interest to further.

The prices of foodstuffs are high. A full and satisfactory explanation of prevailing prices is not possible on the basis of existing knowledge. It is only recently that agencies have been created in the country to study food distribution, and we have not all the necessary facts to enable us to arrive at the truth. Where the food supply is located, who owns it, what may be the difficulties of securing it, whether the local market conditions are due to car shortage, whether there is artificial manipulation or control, no one can state with certainty. It is essential that we have the facts, not only because of the light they might throw on present conditions but also because they are prerequisite for the working out of a permanent, just, and economical system of marketing. Therefore the investigation directed by the President ought to be made promptly and Congress ought to give the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Agriculture the necessary funds. Certainly such an investigation can not furnish immediate relief, but it would be absurd to oppose it for this reason. It does not stand in the way of any other measures that may be wise. It does not prevent any constructive action on the part of any municipal or local agencies. We must have the facts, and the sooner the investigation is undertaken the better. It is highly probable that as a result of it large permanent improvements may be made.

IMPORTANCE OF FOOD CONSERVATION.

For partial immediate relief every individual and community should consider earnestly the matter of food conservation and the limitation of waste. As a Nation we seem to have a disdain of economizing. In many homes there is a strong feeling that it is "only decent" to provide more food than will be eaten and that it is demeaning to reckon closely. The experts of the Department of Agriculture report to me that the dietary studies made by them point to an annual food waste of about $700,000,000. Of course, the waste in families of very limited means is slight, but in the families of moderate and ample means the waste is considerable. Even if the estimate were reduced by half, the waste would still be enormous.

The food waste in the household, the experts assert, results, in large measure, from bad preparation and bad cooking, from improper care and handling, and, in well-to-do families, from serving an undue number of courses and an overabundant supply and failing to save and utilize the food not consumed. As an instance of improper handling, it is discovered that in the preparation of potatoes 20 per cent of the edible portion in many cases is discarded.

THE POSITION OF THE FARMER.

I am informed that the belligerents in Europe in dealing with their food situation have, up to this time, accomplished their purposes more largely through conservation of foods, regulation of diet, limitation of courses and quantities, and prevention of waste rather than through direct control of production or regulation of distribution under any sort of dictatorship. Only recently has England indicated her intention to deal directly with production, and in doing so has recognized it as essential that they guarantee to farmers a reasonable minimum price over a period of years. Obviously, if farmers are to be induced to increase acreage, a guarantee of a reasonable price by the Nation or the community seems necessary. Farmers are governed by the same thinking and motives as other people. They are patriotic; but it is unlikely that they will undertake greatly to increase their output unless they are reasonably sure that it will be profitable for them to do so.

One could no more expect a farmer greatly to increase his product without a knowledge of the outcome than he could expect a manufacturer to double the production of shoes unless he knew that he could dispose of them profitably. Those who are urging that farmers be induced greatly to increase their acreage beyond that which their own judgment dictates, know very little about the psychology of farmers, or of other people for that matter, or about the fundamental necessities of the situation. As a matter of fact, farmers are going to do their own thinking in this matter and will not follow anybody's dictation. They are quite alert to the interplay of supply and demand, and respond quite as quickly as other people to the stimulus of high prices. Before touching upon this particular point further, a word should be said about the estimated food supply of the country for the current year.

ESTIMATED FOOD SUPPLY FOR THE CURRENT YEAR.

The weather conditions during the growing season of 1916 were unfavorable in many parts of the world. They were distinctly unfavorable in this country. Although there was a large wheat acreage, the weather conditions were such as to favor the appearance of the black-rust disease affecting wheat. The consequence was that although the acreage was large the yield was relatively small. The conditions were not especially favorable for corn and for some other important crops. Still the food output on the whole for the current year was not so small as to excite alarm. The corn crop was 2,600,000,000 bushels, nearly the five-year average. The oat crop was above the five-year average, the barley very nearly the five-year average, rye 10,000,000 bushels more than the five-year average, and rice 40,000,000 bushels, as against 29,000,000 bushels the year before, and 24,500,000 bushels, the five-year average. The production of kafir corn, a relatively new crop, was 50,000,000 bushels. The production of peaches, 37,000,000 bushels, of pears 10,400,000 bushels, and of apples 67,500,000 barrels, represents approximately the five-year average, while the estimated production of oranges was 23,800,000 boxes, or 2,600,000 more than that of the preceding year. The crop of sugar beets was one of the largest ever produced. Meat products, likewise, were produced in larger quantities, the estimated amount for the year being 22,378,000,000 pounds as against a five-year average of 19,712,000,000 pounds, or 2,000,000,000 pounds greater than the outpnt for the year 1915. Dairy products on the whole showed a gain as follows:

	1916	1915	1914	Average, 1910-1914.
Milk produced, gallons.	7,959,656,000	7,696,844,000	7,506,794,000	7,569,926,000
Milk sold, gallons.....	2,061,551,000	1,993,482,000	1,944,260,000	1,960,611,000
Butter, pounds.....	1,059,771,000	1,024,780,000	999,476,000	1,007,882,000
Cheese, pounds.....	12,246,000	11,841,000	11,549,000	11,646,000
Butter fat sold, pounds.	326,346,000	315,571,000	307,778,000	310,367,000
Cream sold, gallons....	57,888,000	55,977,000	54,596,000	55,054,000

Poultry products also increased as indicated:

	1916	1915	1914	Average, 1910-1914.
Eggs, dozen.....	1,847,512,000	1,810,912,000	1,774,312,000	1,701,789,000
Fowls raised, number..	566,722,000	555,494,000	544,267,000	522,021,000

WHEAT.

The two food products which reveal a marked decrease were wheat and Irish potatoes. It is evident that the public has failed to look at all the acts involved, especially in the case of wheat. The wheat crop for the current year was reported to be 640,000,000 bushels as against a five-year average of 728,000,000 bushels, and the record crop of 1915 of 1,026,000,000 bushels. Apparently, the public has compared the crop of 1916 solely with the record crop of 1915, and failed to take into account the unusually large carry over from that year into the present year of 164,000,000 bushels or more. Furthermore, its attention has been fixed on the large exports of the two years immediately following the outbreak of the war. The exports of wheat in normal times are approximately 105,000,000 bushels. The year preceding the war it was 145,000,000 bushels. In 1914–15 it was 332,000,000 bushels, dropping in 1915–16 to 243,000,000 bushels. Looking only at the crop of 640,000,000 bushels and having in mind the possibilities of export as suggested by the figure of 332,000,000 for 1914–15, the public naturally apprehended that there would be a lack of bread. Dealers and others became unduly excited. The total available supply, including both the crop and the carry over, aggregating 804,000,000 bushels—part of which, it should be said, was not suitable for milling purposes—should have been considered as well as the relatively small exports for the first six months of the current year. Up to the 1st of January, the exports were only 97,000,000 bushels, and they have tended to decrease partly on account of the disturbed shipping conditions since the 1st of January. Our normal domestic needs of wheat for human food, for seeding purposes, and for a reserve to carry over into the next year require 640,000,000 bushels. As I have stated, the total year's supply is 804,000,000 bushels. This would give us an available exportable surplus of 164,000,000 bushels. At the rate of export since the 1st of July, with the tendency to decline recently, we should have enough wheat in the country very nearly to supply normal needs.

CROP PROSPECTS.

I am not a prophet and can not furnish any guarantee for the future. There are certain things, however, I do know. The farmers, governed as they are by ordinary motives, in response to the present level of prices, have in certain directions shown a definite purpose to increase their acreage. Winter wheat was sown in the fall. The reports reveal that the total acreage was 40,090,000. This is nearly 900,000 more that the amount planted the preceding fall. Much of the latter, however, was winter killed, so that the planting this fall of 5,260,000 acres more than harvested last summer. Spring wheat has not been planted. In 1915 the acreage was 19,445,000 acres. The average acreage for the five years is 18,800,000.

It would be singular if this did not increase; but, taking the average for five year and adding it to the winter-wheat acreage, we have approximately 59,000,000 acres, or practically the same as the record acreage of 1915. What the yield per acre may be will depend largely on the weather conditions. The average of the six lowest yields per acre since 1894 was 12.5 bushels. This would give us 737,000,000 bushels of wheat. The average yield for five years down to the record crop of 1915 was 14.9 bushels. This would give us 879,000,000 bushels of wheat. The average for five years including the record-crop year was 15.5 bushels. This would give us 914,000,000 bushels. A yield equal to that of 1914 of 16.6 bushels would give us 979,000,000 bushels, while a yield equal to that of the record-crop year would give us 1,000,000,000.

THE SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

The Department of Agriculture has done all it could prudently do to call attention to the desirability of adjusting the supply of different sorts of agricultural commodities to the demand. As I have said, farmers are doing their own thinking and will not submit to anybody's dictation. In the South, in particular, the department has waged a persistent campaign for some years to bring about a better agriculture, to stimulate the local production of an ampler supply of foodstuffs. The South has heretofore been too dependent on corn and cotton. It has put too many of its eggs in one basket. Although it is largely agricultural, it has imported in the neighborhood of six or seven hundred million dollars' worth of foodstuffs from the West. It is clearly good economy for the South to supply her own foodstuffs and feedstuffs, and it is certainly a safer practice for her to do so. The department, the agricultural colleges, and many other agencies through the daily press, the agricultural journals, the bankers and business men, farmers' associations, bulletins and circulars, and the farm-demonstration machinery reaching into many parts of the South, have urged the necessity of a better-balanced agriculture and the wisdom of largely increasing foodstuffs. There has been a tendency over several years for the South to practice this agriculture, and following the low price of cotton in 1914 the acreage in foodstuffs considerably increased. It remains to be seen how far the recent high price of cotton will check this tendency. It would be unfortunate if it did so.

THE MEAT SUPPLY.

A further word should be said about the tendency of the meat supply to increase. While, following the outbreak of the war, there was a considerable increase in exports of meats, amounting in 1916 to 1,500,000,000 pounds, the domestic production in 1916 was 3,000,000,000 pounds greater than in 1914, and the tendency is still upward. Figures recently submitted show that the number of cattle on January 1, 1917, was 1,037,000 greater than on January 1, 1916, and that the milch cows had increased in the same period 660,000. A very considerable development in live stock is taking place in the South.

NO FEDERAL DICTATORSHIP NEEDED.

The department and all the agricultural agencies in the country are giving definite and careful attention to these problems. The Federal Government through several of its departments is giving continuous consideration to the immediate problems presented and to the possibility of remedial measures. The solution will certainly not involve a Federal dictatorship, and it is highly unlikely that it will involve a dictatorship in any State or community. America does not take kindly to dictators. The difficulties, in any event, would be very nearly insuperable. We have a continent to deal with, and there are difficulties of double jurisdiction. Consider, for instance, the matter of fixing a minimum price. The Federal Government could deal only with commodities passing into interstate commerce. The States might be hampered in attempting to fix price.

As I stated at the outset, there is no occasion for hysteria. Intelligent planning and constructive action, in conjunction with the operation of normal forces, are what we need and these only can bring about a satisfactory result.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2344) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at the time the Senate took a recess yesterday section 7 of the pending bill was under consideration. Senators will notice that as the bill was originally reported to the Senate it provided an appropriation of $2,010,000. The committee made an amendment to the section including hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle, and increased the appropriation from $2,010,000 to $4,500,000. In reading the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture before the committee I am led to believe that the amount of the increase is absolutely unnecessary. The Secretary stated that he thought $400,000 was ample for the work in the eradication of cattle tick. If that is the case, as I stated last night, I think a million dollars additional to the amount provided for in the bill as introduced in the Senate would be ample and all the money that could possibly be expended during the fiscal year to advantage.

Under present conditions it seems to me that we ought not to appropriate money to extend over a period longer than the coming fiscal year. I call attention to the fact that the Senate will meet in December next, and also to the fact that we have already appropriated this year $360,000 for the eradication of hog cholera. We have already appropriated in the Agricultural appropriation bill this year between six and seven hundred thousand dollars for the eradication of cattle tick. To ask now for $2,500,000 more for these purposes appeals to me as being unreasonable. The bill provides that the expenditure of this money shall cover the period of the war or not later than the beginning of the next fiscal year after the termination of the war.

Mr. President, there is no need for us to appropriate money to extend over a period which may be two or three years. What we ought to do is to give the Secretary of Agriculture all the money that he can expend successfully in the eradication of the diseases of live stock and other animals.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. About half an hour ago I had a conversation with the Secretary of Agriculture and asked him to give me all the data in his possession bearing upon this section of the bill. If the Senate will postpone the consideration of this section for a little while, I think probably I will be able to give the Senate some information that will be valuable in arriving at a proper conclusion.

I agree with the Senator from Utah that we ought not to make appropriations that are not needed, but if they are badly needed for this sort of work they should be made, regardless of the amount. It is just as important to provide for feeding our own people, I think, as for killing other people. We need food for home consumption quite as much as we need bullets for foreign uses.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with all the Senator has said.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Secretary of Agriculture told me he would promptly furnish all the data bearing on this subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I make my statement based upon testimony given by the Secretary of Agriculture before the committee, but if the Senator desires that we shall pass over this amendment for the present and go on with the bill, I have no objection. I would be more than delighted to have the Senator from Mississippi present to the Senate the information he is expecting from the Secretary of Agriculture before action is taken upon the amendment that I propose to offer to the committee amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has the Secretary of Agriculture not made any recommendation to the committee that reported the bill, or are we simply voting blindly upon the bill, without any recommendation from the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of Agriculture appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and testified as to the amount that he thought could be used to profit for this purpose. I understood the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who has the bill in charge, to state yesterday that the committee did not appeal to the department for what the increased amount of appropriations should be; that the committee concluded—which, of course, it had a perfect right to do, and I am not complaining of that at all—to name the amount of the increase. All I am trying to get at is what amount of money we should appropriate for this purpose, with the thought in view that it shall be spent to the very best advantage and during the coming fiscal year. I believe that the amount proposed by the committee is altogether too large.

Mr. GORE and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who first addressed the Chair?

Mr. GORE. I thought the Senator from Utah had yielded the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not yet yielded the floor.

Mr. GORE. I will say at this point that I shall answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] after the Senator from Utah shall have finished.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask the Senator from Utah his view as to the provision of the pending bill regarding the termination of this proposed act, and what effect that might have upon any allotment made out of this fund? If the European war should end by the 1st of next June, as everybody, of course, hopes it will, then, according to this proposed act, whose provisions would not extend beyond the 30th of June——

Mr. SMOOT. The provisions of the act would then only extend for 30 days.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What I want to ask is this: Suppose the Secretary of Agriculture should allot to any one of these particular matters which are mentioned in this proposed amendment, say $600,000, and that that should not all be spent by the 30th of June, would the work have to stop or could the Secretary go on for an indefinite time in the expenditure of what we actually appropriate here, and which he may have allotted for the particular work?

Mr. SMOOT. No. It would lapse not later than the beginning of the next fiscal year——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Would it?

Mr. SMOOT. Which would be on July 1, following June 30, if the war should then be declared by the President to have ceased.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This bill simply provides that the provisions of this act shall cease, but if we make an actual appropriation of a certain sum of money, if the Secretary of Agriculture allots a part of that money to a particular work and that work begins, there is some question in my mind whether or not the expenditure of that money would stop. Of course, the general provisions of the act would terminate and cease, but we appropriate so much money to the Secretary of Agriculture for certain purposes; and when he actually allots that money and begins work, there is a question in my mind whether or not he could not go on and expend the amount of money allotted. I therefore wanted the views of the Senator from Utah on that question, because I know he is thoroughly familiar with such matters.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to say something relative to the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I will yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Agricultural appropriation bill which was approved on August 11, 1916, carried an appropriation for the prevention, control, and eradication of diseases of live stock, including hog cholera, of $1,610,000, and by a succeeding paragraph, for the eradication and control of insects, plant diseases, and so forth, the sum of $3,109,870. It would seem to me, if the pending bill should become a law and should be terminated by the provision for its termination in the event of the close of the European war, that there would be ample funds in the hands of the Agricultural Department under the regular appropriation to continue whatever work which might have been mapped out along that line.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the statement just made by the Senator from Colorado is absolutely correct; but I am so interested in seeing the eradication of the cattle tick and of hog cholera in this country, particularly at this time, that I am perfectly willing to exceed what in ordinary times I should consider an ample appropriation, because I take it for granted that we are all very much interested in increasing our food supply not only of vegetables and grains of all kinds but particularly of meats, in order that we may at least feed the army which we shall have collected in the very near future. Therefore, if I thought that the amount of money asked for in this bill could be expended within the time—and when I say "time" I mean within the coming fiscal year, for I believe it absolutely unwise to appropriate money at this time beyond that period—then I would have no objection whatever to the amount of the appropriation; but I do not believe it will be possible for the Secretary of Agriculture profitably to expend for these purposes more than a million dollars, or very little over and above what we have already appropriated for them in the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was passed last March for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] I wish to say that I believe that section 8 of the bill will effect just what the chairman says it will effect, and that the appropriation will cease to be in effect when the international emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed and shall have been so declared by the President, and not later than the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If that is correct—and I am inclined to think it is—the Secretary of Agriculture might figure that this war would last a year or a year and a half and might prepare an organization based upon the expenditure of the amount of money we have appropriated here. Then the war ceases about the time, it may be, that the organization is effected, and we shall have spent considerable money and have accomplished nothing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when we take into consideration the amount of $4,500,000, and, say that we employ men at $1,500 a year, it can be seen what a vast army of men that $4,500,000 will employ.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Has the Senator from Utah any information as to what has been done with the appropriations which have just been called to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]? Have those appropriations been exhausted?

Mr. SMOOT. Those appropriations do not become available until July 1 of this year, and they cover a period from July 1 of this year down to and including June 30 of next year.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then the Senator from Utah answers my questions by saying that these appropriations have not been exhausted and are yet available?

Mr. SMOOT. They are yet available; in fact, they are available until July 1, 1918.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, is there any evidence that additional appropriations are necessary for this particular purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. There is evidence which was given before the Agricultural Committee by the Secretary of Agriculture to that effect. In that evidence the Secretary of Agriculture states that the department would like to have $400,000 more for the eradication of the cattle tick.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand, then, that four million and some hundreds of thousands of dollars are available?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not $4,400,000, but the committee have added $2,500,000 for the three purposes—the eradication of hog cholera, the eradication of the cattle tick——

Mr. SHIELDS. But the Senator from Utah knows of no evidence that the European war has caused any greater prevalence of hog cholera, or that there is any emergency occasioned by the war which necessitates this larger appropriation?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the European war has not caused any additional hog cholera, nor has it caused any more cattle tick; but it has brought about this condition that in raising the army which we intend to raise, and which we must feed, we find that there is a lack of meat products in the United States, the same as there is of grain and every other product of the farm or the field; and this proposed legislation is for the purpose of increasing the meat supply of the United States; that is its object.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is, I understand, a great shortage, in comparison with previous yields, of both cattle and sheep, but not in hogs, as I am advised, and certainly, unless the disease is prevalent, there is no necessity for an increased appropriation at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I think hog cholera is pretty prevalent in all parts of the country where hogs are raised, and I have no objection to the appropriation of sufficient money to eradicate that disease; but I want the money that is appropriated to be expended profitably. I believe that the amount asked for here is more than the Secretary of Agriculture can expend to advantage in the eradication of hog cholera, in view of the appropriation the department already has available for that purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS. I know of no increased prevalence of hog cholera, if the Senator will bear with me, certainly not in the section from which I come, but I agree with him that, if there is any necessity for it, we ought to appropriate every dollar that is necessary. In these times, however, when we are appropriating such enormous sums for war purposes, there should be no excessive appropriation of this kind and no speculation in such matters. We ought to limit these appropriations to the absolute necessities of the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the position the Senator from Utah is now taking.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to suggest that it might be wise to let this item go over until the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] secures the data from the department. I wish to state that the department has done special work in several counties in Kansas where hog cholera was quite prevalent, and the work they have performed there has been very successful, indeed. In one or two counties the decrease in the disease has been very marked and an extension of the work will be of great value. I think it would be well to wait until we hear from the department, if the Senator has not the information available.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma that he pass this item over temporarily.

Mr. GORE. I have the data which the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Minnesota inquired about and shall submit them to the Senate when the Senator from Utah concludes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator would prefer to proceed with the matter at this time?

Mr. GORE. Well, we can save time, and, if the proposition that I submit does not clear the matter up, then we can pass the item over until the data referred to by the Senator from Mississippi arrive.

Mr. SMOOT. I am just as much interested in hearing what the Senator from Oklahoma has to say and what the Senator from Mississippi has to say as is any other Senator, and so I will conclude what I have to say for the present.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should prefer that the item be not acted upon finally until the data to which I have referred arrive.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Oklahoma says he has the data.

Mr. GORE obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Oklahoma makes his statement, with his permission, I should like to add one or two observations to those of yesterday afternoon, so that he can have them before him when he makes his reply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this bill carries an aggregate appropriation of nearly $13,750,000. In ordinary times that would be a very considerable appropriation. It is something more than one-half of the amount involved in the total appropriations of the last Agricultural appropriation bill. The items constituting these appropriations are analogous to similar ones in the regular appropriation bill. Generally speaking, they are:

For the prevention, control, and eradication of diseases and pests of live stock; * * * for the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture; and the conservation and utilization of plant products; * * * for increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents, and others.

Also:

For gathering authoritative information in connection with the demand for and the production, supply, distribution, utilization of food, and otherwise carrying out the purposes of section 1 of this act.

Generally speaking, Mr. President, the items which these large appropriations cover have, as I have stated, been amply covered by the regular Agricultural appropriation bill. It is to be assumed that the amounts then appropriated represented the requirements of the department for the purposes there designated. It is to be assumed that the Committee on Agriculture, both of the House and of the Senate, were in possession of all needed information upon those subjects from the proper department, and that their amounts were commensurate with the estimates of the department for those purposes. That bill became a law in August, 1916.

The shortage of our animal food supply was then, as now, the subject of very animated discussion. The necessity of increasing it was just as noticeable and just as insistent then as it is now. The necessity of eradicating insect pests and the diseases that are common to food plants, fruit trees, and so forth, was the subject of active interest then as now. As suggested by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the pestilences that follow war have not thus far included the prevalence of hog cholera or multiplied the number of insects that prey upon our food and upon fruit trees. These are difficulties which increase only when the department is lax in its efforts or when some unusual condition, physical, geographical, or climatic in its nature, occurs.

The amount of money then required by the department for the eradication of hog cholera for the ensuing fiscal year was, in round numbers, $360,000. The amount required for providing against other diseases of live stock was $1,250,000, making a total of $1,610,000, and the bill now in operation carrying, it is to be assumed, such amounts of money as are necessary for the needs of the existing fiscal year.

Now, when we come to the subject of prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases, this bill carries an additional appropriation of $2,500,000. The aggregate appropriations for that purpose available after the 1st of July in the regular appropriation bill amount in round numbers to $3,999,870. The bill providing for vocational, educational, and demonstrational education which passed Congress at the last session contains an ample appropriation for the carrying into effect of its very much needed and useful provisions. I think that will be available also on the 1st of July. We propose here to add to those appropriations the sum of $3,000,000, making a total appropriation for subjects already fully covered of $10,000,000, or the greater part of the $13,722,000 which this bill carries.

Mr. President, it is inconceivable to me that any exigency can have arisen since the enactment of the Agricultural appropriation bill requiring this enormous addition to our normal appropriations, which, generally speaking, are more liberal than the necessity requires, because we have been running in that direction ever since I have been a Member of the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I protest against using these emergency bills as conduits for the securing of additional appropriations from the Treasury unless the exigency is so great, unless the emergency is so overwhelming, as to make them unavoidable.

I sympathize to the fullest extent with the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] that while we are appropriating so many billions for the purpose of exterminating mankind it is no more than right that we should appropriate a few millions for their benefit and welfare, for promoting their happiness, increasing their years, and the general prosperity without which a community finds but little excuse for its continued collective existence. But while I make no reflections upon anyone, we are apt in times like these to take advantage of existing conditions in order to increase appropriations for home expenditure; and if there ever was a time when this Government should economize wherever it can economize, now is the time.

We are raising money by billions, and that means enormous increases of the tax burdens of the people. We are issuing securities which never will be paid, but rest as an incubus upon the productive energies of generations for all time to come, in order to meet these extraordinary expenditures and carry this war to a successful ending.

We are warned that economy is essential in the matter of food conservation. Indeed, the ostensible purpose of this bill is to meet, through an increase of food production, a great economic need, which carries with it as a corollary the essential requirement of conservation in the consumption of the food supply. Mr. President, when the Secretary of Agriculture comes before the committee and says he would like to have $400,000 more for a certain purpose, I do not think we should increase the amount beyond that requirement. Now, it is true that this four and a half million dollars does not apply exclusively to hog cholera; but the amendment made by the Senate—which may be useless, since the general language used in the other portions of the section seem to be sufficiently comprehensive to include everything—specifies hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle. These, however, are either mentioned or included in the appropriations of the regular Agricultural bill; and if we shall in these emergency measures take advantage of these conditions, upon the theory that enormously increased administrative appropriations are necessary because of them, then it should appear, before we vote them, that these conditions have been caused by the war and will disappear when the war ends. That is the theory of the bill, the last section of which provides that when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed, the date of which shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President, the act shall cease and determine.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That ought not to be in the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. So it does not make any difference how virulent hog cholera may be when the war ends, nor how badly needed the appropriations for the eradication of these other diseases may be, or how prevalent the insectiferous plague may have become, the emergency, being the war, which causes this appropriation will cease not alone with regard to the great emergency, but as well to these smaller emergencies which the bill proposes to cover. The Senator from Mississippi suggests that that ought not to be in the bill; and I agree that if the emergency is so great as to require these appropriations, then it is impossible to see how it can be mitigated or destroyed by the ending of the war.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I want to suggest to the Senator that this bill, before the amendments of the committee, is the bill that was introduced in the House; and, if the Senator will note, on the first page the attempt is made to predicate this bill upon the war power of Congress. Now, the committee felt that after the amendments which they had made—notably the one on page 3 with reference to the commandeering of seed—were adopted by the committee, there was no question about the war power; all of this could be done under the general authority of Congress, regardless of any special war power. So that section 8 in a way is coupled up with the first part of this bill, and really, it seems to me, has no necessary place in the bill at all, after the amendment on pages 1 and 2 is adopted. The appropriation, if made, is made for all time.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, if the evils sought to be overcome by the provisions of this bill really exist, I do not think the war has anything to do with it——

Mr. KENYON. Not at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Except in so far as the sections to which the Senator has called my attention may be concerned or involved.

Mr. KENYON. And except in so far as there may be more necessity for conserving the meat supply of the country.

Mr. THOMAS. But the bill as it came over from the House included these provisions; so that the inconsistency is not the fault of the Senate, but the fault of the House. What I object to is that these war emergency bills are made the excuse for the increase of appropriations which have nothing to do with the emergency in the most remote way. The war has not increased hog cholera. The war has not multiplied the insectiverous pests of the country. If it has, then it is far more virulent than we have been led to suppose.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado this question: Is there anything in this bill that relates particularly to the existing situation arising out of the war? Or, to put the question perhaps in a more lucid form, is there anything in the bill that would not have been appropriate three years ago or that would not be appropriate five years from now, without any regard to the war, if it is appropriate at all?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I can not answer that question categorically. Generally speaking, there is not. Section 2 makes provision for the furnishing by the Government of seeds which it is required to procure and to sell at cost in order to amplify the crop conditions. If there is at any time, in peace or in war, such an exigency, the Government should meet it by some such bill; but, with that single exception, I do not think there is a line in this bill that can be said to be promoted or caused or affected by our declaration of war against Germany, although the Senator will notice that the bill as it came over from the House in its first section recites—

That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and carrying on the war with Germany by gathering authoritative information—

And so forth, the bill is to be enacted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator think that the seed question is a matter the necessity of which is accentuated by the present condition of affairs?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, no; I would not say that. It may be that the fact has been accentuated by war conditions and has been brought more directly to the notice of the people and the Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Well, of course the war exigency necessitates an increase of crops.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator understands that my objections are not aimed at that part of the bill at all. What I am condemning is the increase of appropriations to meet conditions for which appropriations have already been made.

Mr. BORAH. I had reference to the question submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. As I view it, the question of furnishing seed to the farmers is one of the things which is not only immediately necessary, but one of the most essential things that we can do.

Mr. THOMAS. That may be; but I think the Senator will agree with me that that is not the result of our declaration of war against Germany.

Mr. BORAH. Well, no; it is not the result of the declaration of war; but by reason of the fact that we are in war, it is more necessary to raise a larger acreage of crops.

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly willing that this bill, so far as that is concerned, shall become a law, and I will not oppose it; but I object to the bill being made a vehicle for appropriations which are not needed, and which are not caused by war conditions.

Mr. BORAH. I am in sympathy with that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that by the time this bill passes and becomes a law, and before the Secretary of Agriculture can purchase seed and sell it to any farmers, it will be past seeding time in the case of all kinds of seeds anywhere in the United States; and if we raise a normal crop this year, the seed exigency will pass by next year, in all probability.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that is perhaps an admonition that I had better bring my speech to a close and allow action to be taken on the bill, which I was about to do.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield first to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not quite agree with the Senator from North Dakota in regard to that. It is late, and it is a matter which should have been taken care of sooner, and with reference to wheat that is perhaps true; but there are a great many other things which we desire to raise as to which it does not seem to me that that would be entirely true. There is yet time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assume, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me, that this bill could not be passed and become a law much before the 1st of June; the Secretary of Agriculture could not get in operation the purchase of seeds much before the middle of June, and it would perhaps be the 20th of June, at least, before a farmer could receive any benefit from it. I do not know of any crops that we plant in this country as late as even the middle of June.

Mr. BORAH. Well, if the Senator assumes that we are going to consume the season in furnishing the seed, of course, it will be too late for the farmer; but we have been advising and admonishing the farmers of the country and the agriculturists and producers to raise crops, and so forth. I do not know just how a man without a large bank account is going to plant very many potatoes when it costs $13 a barrel to get the potatoes. The primary thing that we should have done in the beginning was to furnish the farmer seed, and to furnish him cheap credit, and to furnish him labor, or tell him where he could get it. If a farmer could have a reasonable assurance of the seed which he needs, and credit at a reasonable rate of interest, and could be assured in some way that his crop would be garnered when it was ready for harvest, that the labor would be there, in my opinion the farmer would do his part toward raising the products which are necessary to feed the world. These bureaus that do not furnish seeds or relieve the situation with reference to credit or labor will not serve the cause for which they are organized.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, let me reiterate that I am not opposing that part of the bill. I think it should become a law, and if there be any doubt about its propriety the doubt should be resolved in favor of the bill. I merely wish to voice my objections against the utilization of measures of this kind, which are ostensibly war measures, for the securing of appropriations from the Treasury that do not seem to be absolutely needed.

Now, I thank my friend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] for permitting me to make this statement in advance of his reply to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and I yield the floor to him.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I first desire to say a word in regard to the theory on which section 1 was stricken out of the bill. It was merely an invocation of the war power. Some people entertain the belief that by invoking the war power Congress invests itself with a vast amount of power which otherwise it would not possess. I do not accept that theory. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] may have voted to strike out section 1 because of the amendments of section 3. I did not vote for it on that account. I did not believe that Congress, by enacting section 1—a mere reference to the war power—could, by that means, by accepting that congressional act as a basis, proceed to enact other and further legislation which it would not otherwise have had the power to enact. If I believed in any such constitutional theory or process as that I would try to obtain a patent on it as perpetual motion, because it would certainly lead to infinity. As indicated in the report of the committee, I voted to strike it out because I thought it was merely a matter of surplusage.

Mr. President, as to the merits of the pending question, I regret that it is necessary to discuss before the Senate of the United States a proposal of this character. Senators, at least, under their breath, criticize departments for sending bills to Congress with the expectation that they shall pass. The committee is now criticized for seeming to undertake to initiate a policy on its own responsibility, and we are challenged to know if we have a commission from the department to proceed to the enactment of such legislation. I say "seemingly" because there is no conflict between the Department of Agriculture and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. President, in April there was a conference held at St. Louis at which appeared the various commissioners of agriculture of the several States and representatives of the agricultural and mechanical colleges of the several States. They, I take it, represent the agricultural interests of this country. They submitted a series of recommendations, some of which I may say I indorse; and I desire to have read to the Senate one paragraph from their program. It is on page 5 of the document which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Reading from page 5 of the House hearings, at the bottom of the page:

> Contagious diseases of farm animals take a toll of more than a quarter of a billion dollars annually. More than half of this loss is due to controllable diseases, such as hog cholera, black-leg, and Texas fever——

Mr. GORE. Which is the cattle tick.

The SECRETARY (continuing)—

> The Federal Government, cooperating with the States, could profitably expand its intensive regulatory services so as to embrace every important live-stock district in this country.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, this country sustains an annual loss, as evidenced by that statement, of $250,000,000 on account of various diseases among live stock. More than half of that vast amount is due to controllable diseases; I may say that that is one-third as much as the total loss in the United States annually from the ravages of fire. I do not think civilized man ought to suffer or die from preventable diseases. I think it is an impeachment of our civilization. I know the time is coming when civilized men will not consent to die of diseases that can be prevented. Now, we are sustaining our loss annually of live stock, an essential foodstuff, of a quarter of a billion dollars. One-half of that vast amount can be saved by efficient action on the part of the Federal Government. I repeat, I regret the necessity of discussing a measure of this sort before this body.

A good deal has been said to the effect that the European war has not aggravated the ravages of hog cholera in the United States. I do not know whether that remark was intended to be facetious or serious. If it was intended as a piece of humor, Mr. President, it is a grim piece of humor.

There is no division between the original estimate of the Department of Agriculture and the committee of the Senate. The first estimate submitted to the House for this item was $4,100,000 for the various purposes specified. On that basis $400,000 was to be used in the eradication of the cattle tick, $500,000 was to be used in arresting the progress and ravages of hog cholera, and $667,000 was to be used in arresting and preventing anthrax, blackleg, tuberculosis, and other diseases among animals. For reasons that were satisfactory to themselves the committee of another body reduced that estimate from $4,100,000 to $2,010,660. I confess I am dying with curiosity to know what that $10,000 is for.

Now, then, on the basis of the revised estimate, according to the Secretary of Agriculture, of $2,010,660, $231,000 will be used for the arrest of hog cholera, $182,000 for the eradication of the cattle tick, and corresponding reductions are made in other proposed uses.

I had a talk with the Bureau of Animal Industry this morning and was advised it is their opinion that $1,000,000 could be used this year profitably in the arrest of hog cholera alone.

It is true that these diseases have not been disseminated by the war, but it is not correct to say that there is no additional strain upon our food supplies. There is; and the theory of this whole bill is to enable this country to meet not only our demands but to meet our obligations to our friends across the water.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the Senator state from memory how much was appropriated for hog cholera last year?

Mr. GORE. Three hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the Senator state whether there was as much hog cholera last year as there was the year before or as much as there is the present year?

Mr. GORE. About three years ago, I think, was the worst year in recent years. The Senator will remember that we passed an emergency resolution appropriating $600,000 to meet that situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. GORE. Very marked progress has been made. There has been marked success in the arrest of that disease.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, this increase from $400,000, or even $600,000, to $1,000,000 is a very considerable sum. How is it going to be spent? We used $600,000 in an extraordinary emergency.

Mr. GORE. A great deal of it, as the Senator knows, was used in laying the foundation of the organization to carry forward the work.

Mr. McKELLAR. What part of it was spent in organization?

Mr. GORE. I do not have those figures in my memory, but I do have the assurance from the bureau this morning that not only $500,000, the original estimate of the department, could be wisely expended, but that $1,000,000 could be expended to great advantage during a single year, and this is for the period of the year. I have here the Post of yesterday, which states that officials estimate that the war will last for three years. For my part, I wish to meet this emergency. If the money is not needed, it will not be expended; it will lapse. The Government takes no chances. If it can be wisely expended, the Government is at advantage to that extent and the people are benefited to that extent. If it is not expended, then the appropriation lapses and returns to the general fund in the Treasury.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GORE. I think I will answer further the question of the Senator from Tennessee before I yield. I have a statement here from Mr. Rawl that the additional amount can be effectively used with the present organization in the eradication of cattle tick. I will ask the Secretary to read it. It was given a few days ago before the House committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Reading from page 61 of the House hearings from the testimony of Mr. Rawl, Bureau of Animal Industry:

Another item of a million and a half is for the purpose of suppressing diseases of live stock, and it is proposed to put on additional men, averaging about 10 to each State. The more important live-stock States would, of course, use many more than the less important ones. These men would be utilized in suppressing all anim l diseases, such as tuberculosis, contagious abortion, blackleg, anthrax, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you regard that as an emergency proposition?

Mr. RAWL. Yes. If there is an outbreak of disease in a community and it can be suppressed quickly and the animals saved from destruction, we shall have so many more animals; hence this is considered an emergency measure.

The CHAIRMAN. Take up your next item.

Mr. RAWL. In addition to that just mentioned for general disease suppression, there is an item of $500,000 for the eradication of hog cholera.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the total for your bureau?

Mr. RAWL. A little more than $4,000,000. I have not the exact totals, including an item of $400,000 for tick eradication and $35,000 for the eradication of dourine.

Mr. GORE. A little further on the statement occurs that he can expend more by expanding the organization.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. A comment has been made here to the effect that this is not a war emergency. I wish to ask the Senator whether section 3 or the part now of section 1 is not directly a war measure intended for the purpose of getting information concerning "the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foods, food materials, feeds, seeds, fertilizers, agricultural implements and machinery, and any article required in connection with the production, distribution, or utilization of food."

Mr. GORE. The motive, the object, the only purpose of this legislation is to serve the present emergency. If there is no emergency and it is not necessary to take steps to meet the emergency, then the money will not be expended.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I must say, if needed now, it is for the purpose of ascertaining what it is that produces the high prices. It seems to me the authority which is given to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of ascertaining that is eminently proper as a war measure, so that the high cost of living may be stopped, if it can be done.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator if we had asked for three or four billion dollars instead of $4,000,000 Senators would have understood that it was a war measure. Now it has to be interpreted. I think there would have been no trouble in passing the measure, possibly, if it had called for billions instead of millions. We now think in billions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I must admit to the Senator that I think we have not gotten beyond the point where we still think that a million is a considerable amount of money. It seems to me that the increases that we are asked for in this bill are quite large. I wish to get this information from the Senator: What particular knowledge has the department that the diseases exist which require the expenditure of all this money? In other words, to explain exactly what I mean, several years ago we appropriated for the eradication of this particular disease a large sum of money—what we called a large sum of money then. The amount was $600,000. Of course, it would be a mere bagatelle now, but then we thought it was a large sum of money. Now, what particular facts are there that make the department think these diseases exist in the same way they did three years ago when we made that large appropriation?

Mr. GORE. So far as any widespread increase in the prevalence of the diseases I do not know, but there is an added necessity to conserve our food supply. The same amount of food must now go further, must serve more people, which is equivalent to an increase in the disease itself. The department has an extensive organization; it is in immediate touch with the live-stock situation throughout the United States, and this is the result of their investigations. Of course, I can not read their minds, and I do not know every detail or idea on which this is predicated; but I will say it is the consensus of opinion, it is the fruit of the conference held at St. Louis, where there were representatives from nearly every State in the Union east of the Rocky Mountains, both State commissioners of agriculture and the representatives of the agricultural colleges, and we have a right, if we can take anybody's opinion as authority, to base our action on their judgment. Particularly is this true when we take no chance whatever. If the effort is not made to arrest these diseases we save the money. I know the Senator retains an interest in the agricultural welfare and progress of this country. It is a basis not only of our prosperity in peace, but it is the basis of our efficiency in war.

Briefly to review what the committee——

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the Senator leaves that subject, may I interrupt him again?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I agree with the Senator. We should do everything we can to stimulate agriculture and we should do everything we can to conserve our agricultural resorces by the eradication of these diseases. I agree to all that; but the Senator knows that if you give a department a certain amount of money without putting any string on it, just as there seems to be no string on this except a report after it is expended, large sums will be used for the purpose of organization—that is, to have larger bureaus, more men employed, more men looking out for these diseases which may or may not exist, according to the Senator's statement. We do not know that they do exist. The Senator says the money will not be expended if it is not needed. I say if we appropriate this money it will be expended. It is the experience of this body and the body on the other side of the Capitol that whenever we appropriate the money they will find some method of expending it. It seems to me that in common fairness we ought to have some detailed statement as to how this money is to be used and why it is necessary.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator to this fact. As I recall it, Congress has already passed a bill providing for the very thing that is provided for in this bill, and this bill simply enlarges what we have already appropriated for. I think we appropriated something more than a million dollars—the Senator will correct me—for the eradication of these diseases in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. GORE. These are additional sums.

Mr. McKELLAR. These are sums in addition to what we have already appropriated.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to some other items in the appropriation act.

Mr. GORE. Before that is done, let me say that the Senator from Tennessee has lapsed in one particular. The $600,000 appropriated several years ago was not used during the time it was expected to be used, and I think for the two subsequent years the appropriation was renewed and continued, so that the department did not waste or squander it, or, so far as I know, unwisely expend the money. Congressional authority was asked to renew the appropriation, and that authority was granted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not make the statement with positiveness, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment. The appropriation was expended. I do not know whether it was wisely expended. I do not know that any report was made to Congress. I wish to commend the provision in this bill where I see the Senator has put in an amendment which requires the department to report to Congress in the future, especially about this appropriation. I think that is a very wise provision, but I do think we ought to go one step further and have a report from the department as to what they are going to do with this extraordinary sum. We ought to have it. It is an immense sum of money. It is idle, in my judgment, to talk about four and a half million dollars not being a large sum. It is a large sum, and we ought to know where it is going.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GORE. I will yield first to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to some items in the appropriation act. From the Senator's statement I infer he was under the impression that an appropriation of something over a million dollars was made for the eradication of diseases incident to live stock.

Mr. McKELLAR. For several purposes.

Mr. STERLING. For hog cholera and cattle tick.

Mr. McKELLAR. For the diseases mentioned here. That is my understanding.

Mr. STERLING. I call the attention of the Senator to the item of $628,280, a separate and distinct item, appropriated in the same act:

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and repairs, alterations, improvements, or additions to buildings thereon, the inspection work relative to the existence of contagious diseases, and the tuberculin and mallein testing of animals, $628,280.

Now, there is another item which seems to have escaped the attention of Senators in this same Agricultural appropriation act approved March 4 last:

Eradication of foot-and-mouth and other contagious diseases of animals: In case of an emergency arising out of the existence of foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, contagious pleuropneumonia, or other contagious or infectious disease of animals which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, threatens the live-stock industry of the country, he may expend in the city of Washington or elsewhere, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000.

There is this further provision in the act:

Provided further, That so much of the appropriation of $2,500,000 made by the Agricultural appropriation act of March 4, 1915, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, for the arrest and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, contagious pleuropneumonia, or other contagious or infectious disease of animals, as remains unexpended at the close of the fiscal year 1917, is hereby reappropriated and made available for expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, for the objects mentioned in said appropriation act, including necessary investigations to determine whether said diseases have been completely eradicated in districts where they previously existed.

How much was expended I do not know, but perhaps a considerable amount was unexpended. So, in addition to the $628,000 not heretofore mentioned, there is $1,000,000 and the unexpended balance of $2,500,000.

Mr. PENROSE. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota whether it would not be illuminating if the Senate could get a report from the Secretary of Agriculture as to how the money already appropriated has been spent?

Mr. GORE. I will say, Mr. President, that that can be found in the last Book of Estimates, I believe.

Mr. STERLING. I will say, so far as that is concerned, that the appropriation has not yet been spent, and it will be available on the 1st of July.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to ask——

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have the statement while this bill is under consideration.

Mr. GORE. It is available, I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I will try to get the report and put it in his hands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I want to cooperate with the Agricultural Department in every way possible, and I am willing to vote to spend any sum that may be necessary; but I do think, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has well said, that we ought to have reports showing what has been done with the vast sums of money which have been recently appropriated in a blanket measure such as has been read by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I hope that before we vote upon this bill we shall have that information so that we may vote intelligently on it. I also hope that as to all bills hereafter we may require in the bills themselves a report to Congress.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I find in this bill certain provisions about which I should like some information.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, let us take one mystery at a time, if the Senator please.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say, first, in regard to the statement of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], that the $600,000 item, to which he refers, relates, as I understand, to the administration of the quarantine laws. It will be remembered by all Senators that the foot-and-mouth disease prevailed from the State of Massachusetts to the State of Washington.

Mr. KENYON. To the city of Washington.

Mr. GORE. No; to the State of Washington. We have appropriated something like $5,000,000 to indemnify the owners of stock that was slaughtered under that act. Some of those claims have not yet been adjusted, as I understand, and this item is carried forward in order to continue the work of liquidating those claims.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahome yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I understood the Senator from Oklahoma to say that the foot-and-mouth disease was confined to the State of Washington.

Mr. GORE. No; I said it extended from the State of Massachusetts to the State of Washington.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, from Massachusetts to the State of Washington.

Mr. GORE. I believe the disease prevailed in Massachusetts; it certainly did prevail from Pennsylvania to the State of Washington.

Mr. STERLING. But the appropriation is not confined to that purpose?

Mr. GORE. No; it is not confined to that purpose.

Mr. STERLING. The appropriation refers to all contagious diseases.

Mr. GORE. It might possibly be wise for Congress to exercise its war power and pass a law against these diseases. That power seems to be omnipotent now. I think I have here what the Senator from Tennessee desires [exhibiting]. I have hesitated to have this read to the Senate, but I will place it at the disposal of the Senator; and if any Senator desires to have it read, I will have it read. It is a mass of figures relating to these various items, stating in detail the different purposes to which these appropriations are expected to be devoted. I will leave this data here subject to call.

Mr. President, merely one further fact. As stated on yesterday, we have been engaged for 11 years in waging war against the cattle tick. We have rescued some 290,000 square miles from its tyranny, an area about the size of Austria-Hungary, if I remember correctly; but there is still subject to the ravages of that tick something like 500,000 square miles, an area substantially as large as Germany, France, and Italy combined. Now, we sit here and cavil as between $182,000 and $400,000 to be devoted to rescuing this magnificent empire from the ravages of this insect, which subtract incalculably from our food supplies every year that comes and goes. Our food resources are now being drawn upon not only to keep alive ourselves and our allies, but possibly to preserve the existence of this Republic.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I am curious to know whether the chairman of the committee has any idea of the number of men who would be employed under the appropriation authorized in this bill?

Mr. GORE. I think perhaps I have those figures. The statement was, however, that there would be an average of 10 to a State, but that the larger live-stock States would, of course, have a larger number, and those States where the industry was less important would have a smaller number.

Mr. PENROSE. I have been informed that about 7,000 men would be employed under this bill.

Mr. GORE. I have no information of that sort.

Mr. PENROSE. I assume that they would all be Democrats——

Mr. GORE. It is to be hoped so, undoubtedly.

Mr. PENROSE. And that they would be withdrawn from——

Mr. GORE. I do not know whether there are that many Democrats in the country now or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. And they would be withdrawn from the inestimable privilege of serving the country under the conscription law. It does seem to me that it would be more important to fight the enemy than to tackle the ticks and the bugs.

Mr. GORE. I may say that Abe Martin said yesterday that the latest thing in the way of a stalter was the man who looked downcast and said he was sorry he was too old to enlist. So we could employ the superannuated. Senators can not come here until they are 30 years of age, and a man can not be conscripted if he is over 30 years of age. So we can impress into this service men who are eligible for the Senate, and therefore in no way trench upon the vast reserve of the young men of the country who are involved in this strife.

Mr. PENROSE. A good Democrat is never superannuated. It may be well to put a proviso in this measure and in others that are to follow it that no one who is within the conscription age shall be appointed to any position under the appropriation.

Mr. GORE. Why, Mr. President, the reason we do not say that all these employees must be Democrats is that we want the Senator's State to have some representatives in this work. If we confined it to Democrats only, the Senator's State would be excluded.

Mr. President, I have been laboring for years to carry forward this work with greater speed than I have been able to induce others to agree to. If we had had that foresight and prudence, we should have been in a better position to meet the emergency that is now upon us, and this Senate would not have been called upon to enact this emergency legislation.

I may say as I pass that the Senate, in my judgment, has made a splendid record with reference to its attitude on agricultural legislation. We passed here, by a vote of 7 to 1, a few weeks ago an appropriation of $10,000,000 to supply the farmers with fertilizer for the current year—an emergency proposition. In the last Congress we appropriated $20,000,000 to establish a nitrogen plant, one of the objects of which was to provide farmers with fertilizer. Now we are called upon to make an appropriation to rescue our live-stock industry from a terrifically destructive disease or diseases, and, in my own judgment, we ought not to sit here and higgle when we have every assurance that the money will be wisely expended, that the results will answer our hopes, and that the results are essential, not merely for the welfare and comfort of our people, but may be possibly essential to their continued existence as a free Republic.

I merely desire to say one word further. I shall move to reduce this appropriation from four and a half million dollars to $4,100,000, which is the original estimate of the department. As those estimates seem to have such a charm for Senators, I shall expect no opposition to an agreement to that amount.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will permit this section of the bill to pass over until I can get the data which I mentioned a moment ago. I have had a talk with the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and he has promised to have the data here at the earliest possible moment.

I want to say that this great international emergency has demonstrated the importance of the products of the farm to the comfort and well-being of mankind generally. The Agricultural Department of this Government has received less attention at the hands of Congress than any other branch of the Government, and less concern has been manifested by the lawmaking power for the people which that department represents in the Cabinet than for any other class of people. We all realize that upon the products of the farm all permanent prosperity rests. When the farmer prospers, all is well. If propitious seasons smile upon him and he is permitted to cultivate his fields with energy and enthusiasm, a large harvest rewards his endeavor, and we find the railroads doing an immense business, running on full time with full crews; the factories are busy, the artisan and laborer are well paid, the bankers' vaults are full of other people's money, the merchant collects his accounts, the doctors' bills are paid, the preacher dons a new suit of clothes, the lawyer is not forgotten, and prosperity abounds throughout all the land; but let unfavorable season paralyze the strong arm of the earnest farmer, let the blight or the insect pest destroy his crops, and the whole superstructure of commerce languishes, withers, and dies.

I maintain that every dollar invested through the Agricultural Department to promote the interest and ameliorate the condition of the farmers of the country brings a larger return to the American people than any other money expended by the Government.

The farmer has been taught to supply the deficiencies in the soil by the analysis which the representatives of the Department of Agriculture have made; they have learned to prevent and eradicate diseases which destroy their live stock; the insects and other pests have been exterminated, and thousands of other things have been done by the representatives of this department to protect and promote the interests of the men who toil in the soil.

The good effect of the work done by the representatives of the Agricultural Department among the farmers of America can not be estimated. The schooling might be considered expensive if the lessons taught were limited to those who first learn them, but the good result is not confined to those who learn the first lessons; they are handed down from generation to generation.

It seems to me that it is a foolish thing for Congress to withhold from the people, upon the products of whose toil the whole superstructure of our material civilization is based, this much-needed help.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether, in his zeal to represent the good qualities of the Department of Agriculture, he has not somewhat lost sight of the fact that in the larger agricultural States the State universities have done more than the Agricultural Department here and have done it earlier?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I would not be understood as derogating one iota from the good work of those institutions. There is no competition between them and the Agricultural Department; there is, or should be, perfect cooperation. The best minds produced by the agricultural colleges are usually called to the service of the General Government, and the great work of the agricultural departments of the States, of the State agricultural colleges, and of the Agricultural Department of the United States is bringing very large returns to the American people and the people of the world from the investments that are being made in measures similar to the one we are now considering. It is impossible to measure the good that will flow from their joint labors.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust there will not be anything but cooperation between the Agricultural Department of the United States and the State universities of the various States, especially of the larger agricultural States; but I wish to say that there is more friction than there is cooperation in some material parts of the work, especially in the agricultural extension work, where the farmers or those to be instructed receive the instruction in the field. The men who are actually doing the valuable work are connected with the State universities and State agricultural departments, and there is decided friction between them and the agents of the United States Agricultural Department. That is the reason that I avail myself of the courtesy of the Senator to interpolate these remarks. When the matter is under discussion I always feel like cautioning the Department of Agriculture here to proceed more discreetly. They have created a vast deal of friction in several of the larger agricultural States of the West by their natural disposition to assume jurisdiction over and to absorb and destroy the legitimate local functions of the universities of the States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If that be true, Mr. President, I regret it. That has not been the case, however, in the State of Mississippi from which I come. The work of the department there has been very, very satisfactory to the people of Mississippi, and I think has been highly efficient. If there is any conflict or friction anywhere, it ought not to exist, and it is very prudent in the Senator from Illinois to call attention to that fact. If it is a matter that can be remedied by legislation, I should be glad to cooperate with the able, wise, and patriotic Senator from Illinois in calling a halt to the individual who is responsible for it. The work of the Agricultural Department is of more importance than the ambition of any man. However, Mr. President, those little misunderstandings and frictions should not influence the Congress when dealing with a great problem of this kind. The work of the Agricultural Department has been far reaching in its good effects, and I think I shall be able to show from the data which have been promised me from the department that more money is not asked in this than they really need. But if we are asking for more than is really needed I would rather err on the side of liberality than stinginess in dealing with this department of the Government.

So far as its being a war measure is concerned, wherever cholera prevails among the hogs of this country every power this Government can prudently exercise for the extermination of that disease ought to be employed; wherever the cattle tick is interfering with the raising of beef cattle and milk cattle and is crippling that industry it is a very proper function of the Government to aid in the extermination of the tick; and the same is true with regard to all other diseases and pests. We know that the people can not eat, that they can not live, unless the farmer provides these things for them; and I repeat that it is a very proper use of the functions of government to assist the toilers of this country in every possible and proper way for the promotion of their interests.

I hope that the work of the department may not be crippled by a parsimonious or stingy policy. We have heretofore appropriated less money for the Agricultural Department than one battleship would cost in time of peace. Nobody ever questions an appropriation for the building of a battleship or for organizing a regiment of soldiers whose purpose is to destroy human life, but whenever a measure is proposed which is designed to conserve human life and to promote the happiness and welfare of the human race it finds amongst Senators a most active opposition as an unwarranted prodigality of cash. We permit thousands of people to go to permature graves every year because of our foolish policy in not providing means for the extermination of preventable diseases. For instance, it is estimated that the people of this country suffer a loss of something like $300,000,000 every year because of the loss of time on account of invalidism produced by tuberculosis, when, if that amount of money were appropriated for its eradication, the disease would be absolutely exterminated from the United States in less than 25 years. The Senator from Oklahoma has facetiously remarked that the time will come when a man will object to dying of a disease that could have been prevented, and that is true. So I say it is not wise statesmanship for Congress to refuse to enact legislation which will prevent these things that work such enormous ravages and cost so much in life and dollars and cents to the American people. This appropriation is an investment, not a donation; an asset, not a liability. I am going to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he will not pass this section for the moment?

Mr. GORE obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. GORE. I will yield for a question or whatever the Senator desires to submit, if it relates to this question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to some language of this bill for the purpose of obtaining some enlightenment, if possible.

Mr. GORE. Just one minute. I will say that in compliance with the request of the Senator from Mississippi I will ask to have the present amendment passed over, but I wish to add this word first:

The Senator from Mississippi has said practically everything that could be said upon this subject. I would make only one suggestion, that these diseases—hog cholera, cattle tick, and other diseases—can not be dealt with by the individual farmer. They can not be dealt with by the local unit, the county, or the State. The problem is a national one and challenges a national solution. It must be dealt with by some power that is coextensive with the entire country and with the trouble to be eradicated.

I now ask to have this amendment passed over, and then I shall be glad to hear from the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I notice at the end of section 7, formerly section 9, some very general language. After providing in the body of the section an appropriation of money for the prevention, control, and eradication of the diseases and pests of live stock, including hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle, I find this general language:

> The enlargement of live-stock production, and the conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products.

There is nothing in the bill, or in anything that has been said so far, to indicate the purpose of the use of this very general language at the end of that section. How the live-stock production shall be enlarged there is no disclosure. As to the means to be employed we know nothing. Under the provisions of the bill the Secretary of Agriculture may use his own sweet pleasure in any direction which he may think may result in the enlargement of live-stock production. He may purchase a farm and go to raising cattle himself, or take any other course which may meet his view for the time being.

Likewise, the same thing may be said of this general language:

> The conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products.

A term so broad and sweeping that it seems to me it would permit any line of activity.

Then, in the section which follows, the same general criticism, it impresses me, might be made. The first part of the section provides for procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 2 of this act, and the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture. I think we understand more or less what is meant by that language; but the next clause, "and the conservation and utilization of plant products"—can any Senator imagine what the Secretary of Agriculture had in mind in proposing that very general language?

On page 6, at line 7, is another very general clause, just preceding a large appropriation:

> And otherwise carrying out the purpose of this act.

That would enlarge the appropriation for these general purposes of conservation and utilization. Now, it does seem to me that in a bill of this kind we should use language which will not be uncertain, so that we may understand just the purposes for which these large appropriations are made.

There is another clause in this bill which raises a most interesting question. That is at the bottom of page 4, section 5:

> That the President is authorized to direct any agency or organization of the Government to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out the purposes of this act and to coordinate their activities so as to avoid any preventable loss or duplication of work.

I must say that that section raises one of the most interesting questions in regard to the administrative affairs of our Government. Perhaps throughout the departments there is a vast duplication of work; and that the Congress should at some time take up this question of the cooperation and coordination of the different branches of the Government there can be no doubt. But if the Congress at this time is going to consider that question, then it seems to me that it might well modify the language in this bill.

The bill requires that the President may order or direct the cooperation and coordination of other departments of the Government with the Secretary of Agriculture. On page 6, lines 12 and 13, I find this very broad power given by the bill to the Secretary of Agriculture:

> Aiding agencies in the various States in supplying farm labor.

It has been my understanding that the Department of Labor has been handling that identical question. The provisions of this bill would at least clothe the President with authority to direct the Department of Labor to cooperate with the Department of Agriculture, or, in other words, put the activities of the Department of Labor under the jurisdiction and direction of the Department of Agriculture. If you are going to embark upon that field—and it seems to me that it is one that the Congress might well take up as soon as it has the time from emergency matters, perhaps at the next session of Congress—if you want to make a forward step, it can be done by eliminating some of the language of this bill at the bottom of page 4, so that instead of providing "that the President is authorized to direct any agency or organization of the Government to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out the purposes of this act," if you will leave out the language "with the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out the purposes of this act," you will then clothe the President with general authority to bring about a cooperation and coordination of the various branches of the Government wherever it should appear to him to be necessary.

It seems to me that that would be a simple authority, and might be productive of very much good; but at any rate, inasmuch as this provides especially for the furnishing of farm labor, it seems to me that we should not require the Department of Labor to subject its activities to the direction of the Department of Agriculture; and it may be found, in the consideration of other matters, that you would want to put the particular thing to be done under the direction of some other department. If you want to buy these seeds, it may be that you would find some other department that is already in the market, knows what the market is, and is engaged in buying seeds—such, for instance, as the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the Interior Department. That bureau is buying seeds for Indians every day at this season of the year; so why in the bill require that these other activities should cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture? Why not leave out that language, and put it within the power of the President to provide that all the departments of the Government may cooperate and coordinate their forces as he may think for the best interests of the country?

As to the general provisions of the bill, I am very much in sympathy with what has been said by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in regard to the scope of this bill being one which should be dealt with in the general Agricultural appropriation bill. I think practically everything except the work provided for in section 1 of this bill is of such a character that it should be put upon the general appropriation bill, and by all means have the appropriation limited to the fiscal year.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not know but that the Senator's argument to some extent answers itself. He criticized the bill on the ground that certain language is too general and ought to be restricted. Then he criticized the language because it was too restricted and ought to be made more general.

I think I can illustrate to the Senator what the proposal to permit the President to require other departments and divisions to cooperate with the Agricultural Department really means. It is inserted in the interest of economy.

The Federal Trade Commission, I believe, is investigating, under the direction of Congress, the high cost of living. Certain of the duties in this bill devolved upon the Secretary of Agriculture might require that information, but it is not necessary that the Secretary of Agriculture duplicate the entire work of the Federal Trade Commission in that regard. The Department of Agriculture ought to be enabled to avail itself of that information and of that research and avoid the duplication of work and the duplication of expense.

Section 1 directs the Secretary of Agriculture to make a food survey or census of the country. Now, we have a Census Bureau, a very efficient institution, equipped with statisticians and with experts. It might be desirable for the Secretary of Agriculture to avail himself of the experience and labors of that bureau.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not contend that power should not be given to the President to require these various departments and branches of the Government to cooperate.

Mr. GORE. I understand.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But why restrict that to the Department of Agriculture, when the power is to be vested in the President, and he must see the necessity for it before any order is made? If the President sees that the Department of Agriculture is the appropriate one to take charge of a particular line of work, then, of course, the President would so direct.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is restricted to the authority to require other departments to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture. To have made it general would have been more or less of a revolution, and would have provoked a vast deal of criticism. Senators would have stood up here and marveled to know what it meant, just as the Senator from New Mexico marvels about the words "conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products"—a power which, I believe, is regularly conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture, and a duty that is regularly devolved upon him. We are appropriating money to carry forward that work, which is supposed to be of more or less service.

This language with regard to the Secretary of Agriculture alone challenges the opposition of the very able Senator from New Mexico. If it had been made universal I imagine it would have challenged much more general opposition. I think the philosophy of the Senator's suggestion is entirely sound. Somebody, somewhere, at some time, ought to coordinate the functions and the duties of the various departments, bureaus, commissions, and offices of this Government so as to avoid duplication of service and to avoid duplication of expenses; but I doubt the wisdom, and I believe that upon reflection the Senator will doubt the wisdom, of embarking upon the general policy in a measure of this sort, which is designed to meet an emergency, and which ought not to be delayed by a discussion of the general proposition of coordinating all the functions and duties of the Government.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, Senators seem to forget that we are at war; that we have been called here in extra session to deal with the emergencies that have to do with the war; that this is one of the emergency measures that is laid upon us to deal with, and that it should be passed promptly.

We wrangled most of yesterday afternoon and so far at this session over the matter of an appropriation for the eradication of certain live-stock diseases. If it had been a battleship, as was suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]; if it had been anything that was going to stimulate the iron or the steel industry or the coal industry, anything in which some one was particularly interested, which some one at home was pushing that had dollars to earn and dollars to spend, it would have gone through without such careful examination; but whenever there is anything that has to do with the farmer or with the farming industry the farmer has to be supervised and chaperoned and looked after more than the captains of any other industry. The temper of the Senate was shown this last winter, when it was proposed to appropriate for the payment of the services of the Farm Loan Board less money than the farm-loan act provided they should have.

Now, I am not on the Agricultural Committee; I am not a farmer; but I had occasion about a year ago to look into the methods of the Department of Agriculture in handling the eradication of diseases on the farm, and I was impressed with the wonderful work they had done, and how they had gone about it. Senators all remember the crisis over the foot-and-mouth disease a few years ago. Now, the foot-and-mouth disease is so difficult to handle that the Governments of Germany, of Denmark, of Holland, and of Sweden have given it up as hopeless, and are allowing it to run along at its own sweet will, while in this country we have not only handled it and controlled it but a year ago it was substantially eradicated, and I believe it is now not in existence in this country. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] informs me that there has been no foot-and-mouth disease among cattle in this country since the 5th of June last year. That is a wonderful record. I do not know how much it cost to do it. I do not care whether it cost $100,000 or $10,000,000 so long as it was done and done well and economically.

Now we are at war, it is essential that we should produce animals that furnish food. In my own part of the country grain is so high that the farmers are selling their live stock because they can not afford to keep it. There is an emergency. There is something that should be looked into and handled, if we can handle it. In handling the diseases of animals, as has been suggested, we increase the food supply of the country. That is itself an emergency, but the main point is this: We are at war. We have not time to stay here and look into these matters as carefully as we would in times of peace. We must act promptly or we should not act at all. We must trust the departments of the Government. You can not revolutionize the departments of the Government in times of war. It is no time for a reformer. In times of war the reformer must step back and keep quiet; the country will not tolerate him. We can not reform our departments. We have got to take our departments as we have them now, and give them ample power and ample money and trust to their spending the money so far as they can spend it with an adequate return and stop spending it when they have gone as far as they should.

This is only the beginning of the food-emergency bills. This is the first one, and it is mainly for the purpose of investigation. The next proposition will be by those who oppose the control of food and food supplies to wait until the investigation is made; that we must not act without information. The gentlemen who handle the food supply of this country are already gathering. They are getting ready to oppose the control of the food situation of this country. They are in the same position the railroads were in a generation ago. The railroads did not want to be controlled. Nobody wants to be controlled. No reformer wants to reform himself. Reformers always want to control or reform some one else.

It is my personal belief that in order to get through with this war with as little suffering as possible the Government must control the food supply of the country. Every other nation that is at war is slowly coming to that belief. Germany started at the outset. Germany is to-day the greatest example of a completely socialized nation that we have ever had on earth, not socialized for times of peace but socialized for an emergency to accomplish a great work. Other nations are coming to that, some faster than others. If the war continues, as I am afraid it will, we must approach the socialist state, and we must approach the antisocialist argument of those who are opposed to paternalism in the Government.

My attention was attracted this morning to a newspaper clipping which was sent to me. I suppose every Senator received one of these at his home; it was not sent to his office. It is the Price Current—Grain Reporter, published in Chicago, established in 1884. That is at the head of it, so that we can see that this is a fine old established institution. It says:

Exponent of trade interests in grain, hay, provisions, live stock, etc.

I have no doubt they are the exponents and the proponents of the interests in the food supply of this country. I never happened to see the publication before, but this is what is marked with a blue pencil so that a busy Senator would be sure to see it:

BUSINESS AND TRADE CONDITIONS.

It is quite plain that Mr. Hoover, the food commissioner, when, or if, the Congress authorizes the President's plan of food control and creates the office, knows nothing of the grain business or how it is conducted.

I do not know Mr. Hoover. I have never met him. I do know that he has made a great reputation in handling the food business, including the grain supply, of Belgium. I do not want to argue for or against Mr. Hoover. That is introductory. What my attention is arrested by is what is found further along in the article, blue-penciled:

What is the problem? Well, it seems to be now to stop the allies from grabbing all our wheat and other flour grains and taking it abroad to sell to their people at prices that admit of, if they do not encourage, wasteful consumption.

Now, that is rather an offensive statement to make against the allies with whom we are prosecuting a common war for common purposes, allies to whom we are loaning money purposely, so that they can buy our grain to feed their people, who need it; and if they did not need it our allies would not be willing to give these tremendous prices for it. I proceed with the quotation:

There is no evidence that they are doing anything but that, because bread is as cheap (if not actually cheaper) to-day in London as in Chicago or New York.

There is a standing statement if it is true. If Governments of Europe are buying grain here and selling it to their people cheaper than we can sell it to our people, it is time that our Government should know something about it, because I shall show you later that people right here on Capitol Hill are suffering to-day for food, that the children are not adequately nourished. But I continue:

The French Government is forcing the sale of both native and imported wheats at less than cost and paying their own farmers out of the treasury a sum equal to the cost of imported grain, in order that bread may be relatively cheap. In England the farmers and merchants having stocks of oats are refusing to sell them at the Government maximum figure, which represents to them a loss at market prices of 40s. per ton. Now, we submit that human experience has demonstrated that foodstuffs, any kind of foods, can not be conserved in that way. The price must force conservation—economy of use. The great majority of mankind are not thrifty, not foreseeing, take only perfunctory thought of the morrow, and nothing but the pinch of necessity makes them act differently.

I pick up the Washington Post of this morning and read this dispatch from Chicago:

UNDERFED DIE IN CHICAGO—MAYOR BLAMES HIGH PRICES OF NECESSARIES FOR 1,500 DEATHS.

CHICAGO, May 25.

More than 1,500 died in Chicago this year because they were "undernourished and underclothed," declared Mayor Thompson to-day.

"Prices have been so high that people have been denying themselves the necessities of life."

In Chicago, which I understand to be the greatest food market in the world, with the meat products for all Europe coming through Chicago, with all the grain for Europe coming through Chicago, our people already have felt the pinch of necessity, and this trade paper published in Chicago says it is good for them to feel it, that they may economize; and the people of this country are to be undernourished and starved, children are to be stunted, so that the price of grain can be put up high enough so that the people in Europe will not buy too much of it at starvation prices. The article from the Price Current-Grain Reporter continues:

If America must needs feed the world, Americans should, so long as there remains a doubt of our ability to do this normally and amply, demand that the foodstuffs we must supply shall be sold at prices that will enforce economy in their use until the hour of danger of actual, if not relative, scarcity shall have gone by.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator from what he is reading?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am reading from an article that was sent to my residence this morning with a 2-cent postage stamp on the envelope, the Price Current—Grain Reporter, of Chicago. Undoubtedly the Senator also received a copy. This article was blue penciled and is, as I take it, the first assault of those who control the grain of this country upon the proposition that our Government is to control the food supply.

I read in the Washington Star last night some of the prices now in existence compared with 40 years ago. They must be the wholesale prices, because I inquired this morning from one housekeeper, and I am told that she can not buy any food at retail at these prices. The first price is May 24, 1877, and the second is May 24, 1917, 40 years later:

Butter at the farm, 14 cents; now 36½ cents, and I am informed that you can not buy good butter in Washington now at the smaller grocery stores for less than 45 cents a pound.

Eggs at 10½ cents a dozen; now 34½ cents wholesale, and 40 cents for fresh eggs.

Cheese at 12½ cents a pound; now 39 cents, and one housekeeper, of whom I inquired, said she had not bought cheese for a long while, because she could not afford it.

Potatoes, a bushel, $1.15; now $3.10; and they tell me at the grocery stores they are selling potatoes at $1 a peck.

Beef, short ribs, 6¾ cents; now 20½ cents.

Turkeys, live, on the farm, 9 cents; now 24 cents.

Fowls, live, 8 cents; now 21½ cents.

Lard, 10 cents; now 22 cents.

Sugar retails in this city at 9 cents, milk at 10 cents. Other provisions have gone up in proportion.

Now, the very grave situation in this country is the one which always comes in war time, and that is the grave situation of the mechanic and wage earner and those who live on small fixed salaries. My attention was called to that last fall. I was in Manchester, N. H., our largest city, and I was waited upon by a delegation of men and women. I spoke to each one of them. There was not a doctor or a lawyer or a merchant in the crowd. They were poor people, wage earners, respectable people, neatly dressed poor people. They asked me to use my influence to get New Hampshire soldiers back from the border as soon as possible. I asked each one his reason, and in each individual case the reason was that it was a brother, a father, a son, or some one on whom that particular person was dependent. Here last fall, when we were not at war with any country, in the midst of enormous prosperity, with the trade journals bragging about it and writing about it all the time, we were conducting an expedition to protect our border against Mexico, and the burden was falling only on the poor people of the country, whose relatives were in the ranks as militiamen. It came over me that that is always so in war times—the people who suffer are the people who are right down on the fringe of existence. That is true now. Take it right here in Washington.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will permit me, that is the class of people who are going to be pinched in this war, too.

Mr. HOLLIS. My point is that the burden is here and we are not awake to it, and it is time we did awaken and attend to it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think so, too.

Mr. HOLLIS. One housekeeper told me that in the past two years the cost of her table for the maintenance of her family had more than doubled; that it has increased 108 per cent. I believe that is so right here in Washington where we are living. One man, a mechanic, was getting a thousand dollars a year. We think if a man is getting a thousand dollars a year he certainly is not suffering, but this man's wife died a few years ago and left him with three little children, and he tells me that with that thousand dollars he absolutely can not give his children food enough and pay for their board, that they are suffering on a thousand dollars a year. I know instances where children within half a mile of where I now speak make it their practice to go around to the garbage cans and satisfy the pangs of hunger from the offal from the tables of people who are more prosperous. Many people who are supposed to be in easy circumstances are absolutely getting along without fruit, considering fruit a luxury. Now, fruit is necessary for a well-balanced ration. Fruit is necessary for a healthy person. Even among the white people within a mile of the Capitol butter has been absolutely cut out for several months. Butter is one of the animal fats that is necessary to sustain good health. They are eating no butter, they are eating nothing on bread, and using oleomargarine for cooking purposes.

Grocers who deal in meat as well as vegetables have informed me that instead of throwing the scraps in the garbage, they are saving all their odds and ends, and people who can not afford to buy are coming around and getting those scraps; that they come around after dark because they are ashamed to be seen getting them in the daytime. That is right here in Washington. Small grocers here on Capitol Hill are not buying canned goods now because at the present prices people are not buying canned goods. They do not dare to load up with them, because they are afraid they can not sell them. That is right here.

I put in yesterday's RECORD, so that Senators might see them, some communications from my own part of the country. The first is from E. H. Kelley, who is the field agent of the National Emergency Food Garden Commission, under the control of Mr. Charles Lathrop Pack. Mr. Kelley is a graduate of the New Hampshire State College, and he is investigating at present in Vermont. He says:

The greatest question throughout New England at present seems to be one of labor rather than anything else. In almost every case where I have talked with farmers they say they could and would do more if they had the help. Many of the farmers are putting in smaller acreage simply because it is impossible, practically, to get help.

Here in Vermont a very great problem is the matter of grain. To-day I was talking to a man who has a big dairy, and he said that he is going out of business because he is simply paying out of his own pocket to keep the thing going. He is one of many who are doing the same.

This shortage of grain and the high price which they can get for their animals is simply depleting the country of its stock, but it is almost impossible to make the people see the folly of selling off the animals which are needed for reproduction.

The matter of seeds has quite a little to do with the acreage planted. I am constantly asked the question as to how they can afford to plant with the price of seed so high. Quite a few dealers are taking advantage of the situation to bleed the farmers, and because of this the planting is being held up.

That is one of the answers to the questions that were asked here yesterday why the Government should sell seed to farmers. Why not leave others to do it? Everyone who has bought anything in the last year or two knows that retailers make the excuse of war prices to put up the prices on everything, whether they are warranted or not. Buy something that you have been buying cheaper and ask them why they put the price up and they tell you, "It is the war, you know." That is the answer given.

To continue:

For example, I know of one case where a large wholesale concern "had no beans," and yet I know absolutely that they had 400 bushels which they were holding for a higher price. They got the wrong end of it, though, because the community (———, N. H.) imported 200 bushels.

There was a case where the community got together, pooled their issues, and bought seed beans, and the man who had been holding beans for a high price got left. He probably will have to eat beans for the next year or two.

Still another question is that of the food speculators. Here in ——— I found a store with 15,000 barrels of flour—

Think of that in Vermont—15,000 barrels of flour—and selling just as little as possible to their customers. Within a day's ride of here I can find 37,000 barrels being held for a high price.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose they found a farmer in the Northwest who had 5,000 bushels of grain in his bins and would not sell it, what would the Senator do with it?

Mr. HOLLIS. That is not the present bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can find them now who will not sell their grain, either wheat or oats or corn; they are holding it. Does the Senator propose any remedy for it?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; I do; but not in this bill. I shall have something to say about that later, but not in this bill. Mr. Kelley continues:

I mention these facts merely to show you what I am running up against and the problems which I am trying to solve. Perhaps I am going into the matter too deeply, but it seems to me that I should do everything in my power to help the people in such a serious state of affairs as exists at present.

Now, the question is, What shall I do? If anything is done at Washington to relieve these conditions I wish you would let me know about it, so that I may be able to put it into practice just as soon as possible. Everything that gives the people more confidence serves to increase the food production, and I think they should be given all the encouragement possible, especially by the Government, because it is urging them so strongly to do their bit. It certainly should back them up in what it advocates.

The point of that is, Here is a man who is investigating conditions setting out what he finds, and we are wrangling here for two sessions over an appropriation that is intended to improve the condition, when all we are asked to do is to pass the appropriation and leave it to the Agricultural Department to spend it so far as it is necessary. I would not do that in peace time, but I would certainly do it in war time.

The next letter I put in the RECORD is from a man whom I know, who lives in my city and in my ward. He is a man who works in the Boston & Maine Railroad shops. He wrote me May 15, as follows:

CONCORD, N. H., May 15, 1917.

HENRY F. HOLLIS, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At the request of my shopmates, who wish to know the truth of the national food situation, I am going to tell or try to tell you how we feel about it. Of course, you understand our means of obtaining information consist of only what we can get from the "press," which, to say the least, is very confusing information. First they preach economy, then warn against parsimony; then Mr. Hoover, in big headlines comes out and announces that prices can be cut 40 per cent with fair profit to everybody. If this statement is true, why does not the Government take steps to accomplish this most desirable end or give the statement the lie? How are workmen—of whom 90 per cent, according to the manufacturer's estimate, live within two weeks of starvation all the time—to draw any line between economy and parsimony?

We have obtained raises in pay but living cost has gained on us 3 cents to our 1 in wage advance, so we are relatively worse off. Railroad men are losing their right by new laws to right this condition with our only known weapon—strike—so we must perforce look to the Government, which has tied our hands, for relief. Is the Government taking any steps in this direction—lowered living cost? These compulsory clauses are thought amongst us to be an unnecessary and insulting reflection on our patriotism.

Can and will you help clear up this perplexing situation? If the food situation is as bad as painted we are willing to do "our bit, pay the cost, and help out if necessary." We want help.

This letter is not written in the spirit of criticism, but with the intent to help clear a situation which will bring into existence a spirit of criticism hard to quell later on, for if conservative old New Hampshire is sizzling beneath the surface on this question, other parts of the country must be almost to the boiling point.

Hoping this letter will be received in the spirit intended and considered fully, I am,

Yours, respectfully, ROBT. JORDAN.

There is a man who is getting probably $1,200 a year. Probably the wages of the other men in the railroad shop are about the same. The small advance they have received in wages is overwhelmed by the tremendous advance in food cost. These men are not well off.

Business is always stimulated at times of rising prices for this reason: A man immediately makes a profit in the stock that he has on hand. What he buys now he can sell later at a profit. That is the business man, the man who is prosperous and earning a greatly enhanced income. He is perfectly willing to have the cost of living high. He does not care, if he can pass that along to some one else. But the laboring people of this country are up against it now. They are not only the people who are asked to fight the battles, but they are the people who are asked to suffer, as suffering must come in war times.

This trade journal says it is good for people to be pinched in order that they may learn how to economize. I do not know that it is good for people to be pinched in order to learn how to economize. That was the situation with the Malthusian doctrine a generation ago. Senators will remember that the Malthusian doctrine preached that population tends to increase in geometrical proportion and that subsistence tends to increase in arithmetical proportion. The theory is summarized in this statement that population always treads on the heels of subsistence. That is true. There is only so much land in the world, and you could cover the land the world over so thickly with people that they could not possibly live. There is a limit to the amount of food that can be produced, and therefore when the comfortable, prosperous people all over the world were told the people were starving, they said, "Oh, well, people have got to starve. There will always be more people born than can be taken care of, and therefore they must starve. Anything that is inevitable is not any concern of mine. God Almighty made it that way, and we must not interfere with His law." As people have advanced and learned more they have learned that it is better to have fewer children and bring them up well than to have a great many and not bring them up well, and we are hearing a great deal now about birth control. There has been a positive check on population among the well-to-do people. That is the way the well-to-do people work it out. Just as the Malthusian doctrine has been disproved, just as we have shown it is not necessary to have more children born than can be well taken care of, so the theory—equally damnable, in my estimation—that the people must feel the pinch of poverty through high prices before they can get relief should be discarded before it gets a foothold in the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's discussion of this subject, like all his discussions, is very illuminating. I am fully in accord with his view of this particular problem and the importance of solvng it if we can effect it by some legislation, but I should like to inquire of the Senator how it is to be effected by appropriations covering subjects regarding which we have already made, from the standpoint of the department, ample provision? That is the part of the measure which concerns me, and I am satisfied, if my viewpoint is correct, it should be amended.

Mr. HOLLIS. My observations this afternoon are addressed more to the general problem than to the particular provisions of the bill, but I shall answer the Senator's question. If the other appropriations are ample to cope with the emergency, I certainly do not believe in making any further appropriation. Now, the question with me is whether the Department of Agriculture can be trusted with a liberal appropriation for this purpose, to handle it wisely and not overspend. We put over $3,000,000,000 in the hands of the War and Navy Departments the other day, and we passed that bill, I think, in two days. I was one of four Senators here when that measure went through. If I recall rightly, the Senate voted $3,390,000,000. I have not the exact figures. But the Senate did not debate it at length. I am not a pacifist; I believe in spending money; but I do not believe in an emergency that has to do with food we ought to sit here daily and hourly and debate it at great length. My own excuse for talking so long is that I am discussing the general food situation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I am in entire accord with that statement also. I expect to vote for every appropriation that will be necessary to even imperfectly solve this food problem, but I am unable to see how it can be done by this sort of legislation. Of course large appropriations may be properly made, because we deem them to be necessary on account of the existing emergency. That very reason, to my mind, is the reason why we should be very careful about making small appropriations which are made under the guise of an emergency bill, but which are designed to cover matters already covered by existing legislation.

Mr. HOLLIS. I know the Senator shares my view on this subject, and I think the Senator performs a most useful function in directing our attention to these things. But the enormous bill we passed for the Army and Navy the other day we passed because the heads of the War Department and the Navy Department furnished estimates and told us they needed the money, and we trusted them to spend it wisely. Now, the Secretary of Agriculture, through the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, comes here with certain figures and tells us what we ought to do in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. My understanding is that the department does not want these sums of money; at least, it does not want the amount in the course of a year.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say to the Senator that the estimate was $25,000,000. The present bill, as introduced, carried $18,000,000. As reported to the Senate by the committee it carried a little less than $14,000,000. For the item which is under consideration now the department originally estimated $4,100,000. The House committee cut it down to $2,010,000. I do not know whether the Senator was in the Chamber when I analyzed the estimate.

Mr. THOMAS. I was called out of the Chamber, I am sorry to say.

Mr. GORE. Very well. This is all estimated for; at least $4,100,000 of this item was estimated for by the department. I have an analysis of it here from the department, and I have given notice that I would move to cut down the amount from $4,500,000 to $4,100,000 in accordance with those estimates.

Mr. THOMAS. While the Senator is on his feet, let me call his attention, merely for information, to another of these appropriations. My question is not controversial. I refer to the item which provides, among other things, for vocational education. My inquiry is whether the Senator can tell me what amount was appropriated under the bill which specifically creates the Bureau of Vocational Education?

Mr. GORE. Is the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] in the Chamber?

Mr. THOMAS. He is not.

Mr. GORE. He was the author of that measure in this body.

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection is that the sum is $2,000,000.

Mr. GORE. It is on a graduating scale. At the end of a few years, I think, it rises to that sum.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; to much more than that in its ultimate amount.

Mr. GORE. It is on a graduating scale, but I do not remember the figures. However, I will say in that connection that some of this appropriation is for demonstration work. There are about 2,800 counties in the United States, and there are about two-thirds of those counties that have farm demonstrators in them now. One of the objects of the bill is to put such demontrators in the other third of all the counties, so far as is practicable.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, answering the question of the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I desire to say that I certainly would not believe in placing in the hands of any department more money than they themselves wish to spend or than they believe is necessary; but we have a Committee on Agriculture to look into these things, and when the chairman of the committee gives us figures and says the money is desired and is needed, in view of the very large appropriations that have been passed I believe in passing them as emergency legislation and trusting that they will be wisely expended.

There is a slowing up of business, it is said, in the retail trade; that the department stores are discharging clerks and other employees. That is undoubtedly true, and it is undoubtedly for the reason that when people have paid what they must pay for food to keep alive they have not money to spend for clothing and other things that are supposed to be necessary in peace times.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New Hampshire says that this is emergency legislation. Merely for the purpose of getting information, I should like to know what emergency there is now in the matter of hog cholera, cattle tick, and the contagious abortion of cattle which did not exist when we passed the last appropriation bill just two months ago?

Mr. HOLLIS. I shall be very glad to answer that question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not obtained that information, and I should like to have it if the Senator has it.

Mr. HOLLIS. In the first place, I am not a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and I am not probably fitted to satisfy the Senator; but this is what my idea is: Because of the war emergency and because the question of the food supply has become so overwhelmingly important, it is more necessary than it would be in normal times that we eradicate cattle diseases so that our live stock may be kept alive and that we may get food products from them.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the department at the beginning of the last short session came in with a recommendation showing what was needed, and Congress substantially gave what was needed. Now, surely the Senator does not mean to say that our declaration of war has increased hog cholera or cattle tick or other contagious diseases or any other diseases?

Mr. HOLLIS. That joke has been perpetrated two or three times already. I am trying to discuss this matter seriously. I repeat that I am not on the Agricultural Committee, but my understanding is that the department asked for so much money; that the sum was cut down largely in the other House; that they did not get the appropriation they needed; and they now ask for the appropriation that they need. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from New Hampshire will yield for that purpose, I shall be glad to answer the Senator, though I am not an expert. I am merely seeking information.

Mr. SHAFROTH. When the Senator from Tennessee attacks this bill as not an emergency bill, what can he say as to that part of the bill which provides:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foods, food materials, feeds, seeds, fertilizers, agricultural implements and machinery?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think those provisions are entirely right, and that we ought to appropriate for them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then the Senator's objection was not to the entire bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, not at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But it was simply as to certain provisions of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not making objection even to certain provisions of the bill. I am merely trying to get some information, if I can, as to what facts there are in the possession of the committee or in the possession of the department which make this appropriation imperative. For instance, we have in one item under section 7, the first item, for which we are now asked to appropriate $4,500,000 for the control and eradication of hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle, when we have already appropriated at the short session of Congress for that very thing. What facts are there showing that we should be asked to appropriate this enormous sum in addition to what has already been appropriated for the current year?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from New Hampshire answered that, it seems to me, very clearly; and that is, the necessity for the conservation of food is so much greater now and the needs for this work exceed probably the amount which was appropriated.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator means that the declaration of war has made the conditions in this respect worse than they were before, I can not understand that reasoning.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think I will ask my friends to let me proceed. I am trying to make a general speech on food control and supply, and I think I should like to continue. I shall occupy but a few moments more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire declines to yield further.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the subject of food supply is only one of the questions we have got to meet. In my judgment it is about as necessary to control the price of steel and coal as it is to control the supply of food. We are only going to get out of the proceeds of our liberty loan 25 or 30 per cent of the face of it, and that is easy to be demonstrated. We are borrowing money so that we can buy ships and supplies to prosecute the war. Prices are so high that we have got to pay anywhere from two to three or four times as much for those supplies as we would pay in normal times. When we get the $2,000,000,000 from the loan and come to buy those things we are going to get only about one-fourth of what we would in normal times. If the prices——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to get on; and when I am through, if I can, I will be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am trying to develop the subject. I am very sorry not to yield, but I should like to get through. We have got to pay for this liberty loan in normal times, when the articles our country will produce are going to bring normal prices, and we have got to expend in effort, energy, and saving three or four times as much as we are going to get under this liberty loan. I firmly believe that in order to do justice to the people of this country, who must eventually pay the taxes to pay off the liberty loan, the Government should take control of all prices and see that it does not pay more than a fair profit to those who furnish the supplies.

Take the steel industry. Steel billets—I have forgotten the exact figure—used to be sold for $20 a ton, while now they are up to $60 or $80 a ton. I cite that by way of illustration. Soft coal, which enters into the manufacture of ships and munitions, and which used to be sold for a dollar a ton, is now selling for three and four dollars a ton, and other things are selling in proportion.

I do not believe we can carry on this war successfully unless we follow the example of Germany, and put in force the very much-hated power of paternalism. When you conduct a war you are performing a paternal function. The Government is the father of us all to put this war through successfully; and in order to put it through successfully it must control not only the prices of food, but the prices of other supplies.

Now, consider conditions in time of peace. People are born into the world without the choice on their part as to their status in life. A child is born into a poor family, and he finds as quickly as he knows anything that all the land has been occupied and allotted before he has a chance to get his share of it. He finds that one boy who goes to school with him is a member of a family which has accumulated millions of dollars, while another boy, with whom he may not be allowed to associate, was born into a family with even less than he has at home. If we allow private agencies to control food and the necessities of life, those who are on earth controlling those things and their children have an enormous advantage over the children who are born into the poorer families.

The real cost of living arises from the distribution after a thing is produced. The competition among farmers and manufacturers is sufficient; the lure of private initiative and selfishness is sufficient; so that food and other articles are produced very cheaply or comparatively cheaply. Take, for example, the ordinary 25-cent socks that men wear. They are produced by a manufacturer and sold at 8 cents a pair, the other 17 cents going into distribution, and distribution alone. Take milk. Milk is sold by the farmers on the cars in my State for 4 cents a quart, and is distributed by the retailer at 10 cents a quart. There is 6 cents for distribution.

For the prosecution of this war the Government ought to take over the production of all the essential necessities of life, such as coal, steel, lumber, and food. They should take from the farmer friend of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] the 5,000 bushels of grain which he has raised himself at a price to be fixed by the Government; and then the commodities should be distributed at cost. In that way I hope the people of this country will learn that the Government can perform distribution more justly, more economically, and more for the benefit of all the people than those who get control of one particular industry, like the grain dealers whom this journal represents, can control it for them.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I do not rise to address the Senate on the measure under consideration, but to offer some comments on the revenue bill recently passed by the House of Representatives and now under consideration by the Finance Committee of the Senate.

The President of the United States, in his address to Congress on its convening in special session, advised the people of the country that in the war upon which we were about to enter it would be the duty of the Nation to pay substantially the entire expense of the conflict as the war proceeded.

I did not agree with him then in this matter, nor do I at this time. It has seemed to me that the men of this day are making their sacrifice greater by far than those who come after them. Not only are they offering their lives that permanent peace may be established throughout the world, but are being asked to pay the bills as well. I submit that the great service that the people of America are rendering for the future of mankind is of a character that those of the next 10 or 20 years can offer no objection to sharing part of the cost of this great war, which in the end will mean so much for civilization.

In considering this whole problem of raising revenue is it not well to bear in mind the methods under which our country has developed since its foundation? Have Senators stopped to think that in the building of our great transcontinental railroads the entire cost of the building of the roads was borne with borrowed money? Cities have been built and businesses of all sorts have been developed largely through bonded indebtedness. So that if private enterprise can finance itself for a period of years, how sensible it would be for a country like ours, with all of the nation's wealth, to extend our credits for a reasonable period rather than inflict unnecessary hardship upon the people at this time.

When the bill authorizing the $7,000,000,000 issue of bonds and certificates of indebtedness was under consideration I urged the Senate to increase the bond authorization to $6,000,000,000 and to reduce the amount of certificates of indebtedness to one billion. I advised that this be done because I believed that the best interests of the Nation would be served if in the initial step we were careful not to frighten industry in levying the burden of the war. The Senate did not heed my warning; and this, coupled with the attitude of the House of Representatives in its effort to enact a law which will collect in taxes from the people an amount exceeding $2,000,000,000 this year, has, in a measure, materialized the fears which I expressed, for business is already slowing down in many lines.

The effect upon the public through the action of the House is indicated by the public liquidating of securities of established enterprises and the slowing down of new enterprises. If the mere possibility of such a condition will produce such action, what will the actual taxation do? Business would not only be curtailed, but we might bring about a panic in industries—a condition which would be deplorable and disastrous at this time.

Congress should not adopt any principle of taxation without having always in mind the enormous bond issue which must be sold. We do not know whether this war will last one year or three years or five years; we do know that the nations of the world are looking to America to bear the financial burden. Taxation and bond issues will go along side by side. Every dollar in the country is available to the Government. The question is how to make these dollars do the best work. The foreign nations have keenly appreciated this. England has from the beginning raised a substantial proportion of her cost of the war by taxation, but nothing like the proportion that we propose to raise; France, until recently, has raised no part of her cost by taxation because of the imperative necessity resting upon her to borrow huge sums from her subjects. Likewise Germany, until recently, has rested solely upon her bond issues. We are in a stronger position than England, France, or Germany, but the same general principles must control us. The problem is with us as with them; how to make the dollars do the most work.

The first essential is to ascertain as accurately as possible what the cost of the war will be for us the first year; what it will be for us the second year and for the third year, if it lasts that long. Having made such an estimate, which necessarily must be approximate, we can then determine what proportion of the money should be raised the first year by taxation and what by bond issues. It is imperative always to keep in mind that the two methods react strongly upon each other.

For instance, let us assume that the total cost of the war the first year will be $4,000,000,000. In this we are ignoring loans to our allies, to which I will refer later. Then suppose that of this $4,000,000,000 we raised $3,000,000,000 by bonds and $1,000,000,000 by excess taxation. Even though the rate of interest on our bonds ultimately reaches 5 per cent, we could, by continuing the excess $1,000,000,000 taxes for four years, pay the whole cost of a one-year war in a little over four years. That is to say, the $3,000,000,000 of war bonds and the interest on them would be paid in that time by simply continuing the $1,000,000,000 per year taxation.

If the war lasts two years and the cost of it during the second year rises to $5,000,000,000, and provided that during this second year we raise $4,000,000,000 by bonds and $1,000,000,000 by taxes, the total debt at the end of the second year would be $7,000,000,000; that is, $3,000,000,000 bonds the first year plus $4,000,000,000 the second year. The interest on this large debt, again assuming 5 per cent, would be $350,000,000, leaving $650,000,000 for retiring bonds. By continuing the $1,000,000,000 annual excess taxation the whole debt, with interest, would be retired in less than 11 years.

In this I am assuming that the present generation shall bear the cost of the war. It is perfectly easy to do this even if the war lasts three years or four years by simply arranging a proper relationship of taxation to bond issues, and by continuing the taxation of the last year of the war for a sufficient number of years to retire the bonds. This means, however, that the productivity of the country shall be kept at its highest pitch, and that the Nation will enter the new era which will begin after the war with its people able to pay the high taxes which will be necessary. To wrench industry apart, however, by violently deranging the existing system is to cripple the taxpaying and bond-buying power; it is to lay the emphasis not upon winning the war but upon social readjustment which is really at the bottom of the Pinchot propaganda.

Many of those who are to-day advocating the enactment of legislation which will take all incomes exceeding $100,000 a year are more interested in advancing their own theories of government than they are in bringing the war to a successful conclusion. I have heard it said by more than one Socialist that this is their opportunity; that by so upsetting business conditions here they hope in the end to drive this country to socialism.

In the foregoing estimate I have not taken into account the bonds that must be sold in order to make loans to foreign countries. If these loans are properly made, we must assume that substantially all the money will be returned. We do not, therefore, need to arrange our taxing program with reference to paying either the principal or interest of such bonds. The fact, however, that these bonds must be bought by this country is a further reason for not crushing the bond-buying power by exorbitant taxation.

Even if the war continues so long that it is necessary to pay for it in two generations, I can see that no great injustice will be done. In large measure this is a war for the young of this generation and for future generations, and, like England and France, we should let them bear a fair portion of the burden.

Our duty to-day is to raise abundant foodstuffs and to keep industries essential to the war at their highest point of efficiency.

The duty of the older men of this generation is to bear a heavy portion of the burden. They should be called upon to give most liberally of their means, but extreme care should be taken to avoid crippling the great business interests of the Nation, which should devote their best energy to keeping up the production of everything essential to the successful prosecution of this war.

There is much in the proposed revenue bill which is not sound and which will hamper both individuals and corporations. The proposal to make the income tax retroactive is absurd and impossible. No tax may be levied on last year's income for the sufficient reason that last year's income has ceased to exist. It has either been spent in maintenance or has become capital. In either case it is no longer income. You may say that you are levying a tax on last year's income, but you are not. As payment must come out of the income of the present or future, the tax is on the present or future income. This is obvious.

The so-called excess-profits tax is unfair to many corporations and copartnerships. The tax is computed on only the actual cash which has gone into a business. No allowance is made for good will, which may have been years in the making and be of great positive value; also a vast amount of energy may have been expended in creating this good will, to say nothing of the money spent but not readily accounted for. Patents and trade-marks are recognized only in so far as money has been paid out for them or in developing them. Trade and the financial markets place a dollars-and-cents value on these things, but the House bill does not.

The excess-profits tax, as passed by the House, is not a tax on excess profits but a tax on all profits. The British and German excess-profits taxes, however, are what they pretend to be. In the former country the system is to take the profits for the three years directly preceding the outbreak of the war; the years ended with July, 1912, 1913, and 1914. The mean year is disregarded and the other two averaged. For example: A company earned in 1912, $20,000; in 1913, $23,000; in 1914, $24,000. By averaging the best and the poorest, or 1912 with its $20,000 and 1914 with its $24,000, the average or normal profits would be placed at $22,000. Now, if this company earned, say, $30,000 in the current year, the difference between this sum and the normal of $22,000, or $8,000, is regarded as the excess upon which the excess profits tax is imposed.

The German system is similar, except that the Germans take the five years preceding the outbreak of war, eliminate the best and the poorest, and average the remaining three. This, if anything, is a truer average than the British, for it embraces a longer period.

This system could be applied to the United States. The argument against doing so is that there is no satisfactory prewar period, as the years preceding the outbreak of the European war were poor ones for American industry, while the years following were unusually good. This might be overcome by making the average on a long period or by taking a good and a bad year, for instance, 1913 and 1916. For companies which have been started since the war some percentage of capital basis might be feasible, but such companies are very few compared with the number of all companies.

We should tax incomes. The minimum, and the tax on the minimum, should be made low, so that all may feel they are bearing a portion of the burden without imposing unnecessary hardship.

We should make the maximum high, but not so high as to remove the incentive to accumulate, which in turn would put a quietus on enterprises and seriously affect all industry.

Many have the idea that people with large incomes spend a good part of them in living. The fact is that actual living expenses are but a small proportion of the income, the great bulk of it returning to reproductive enterprises, the extension of business, the payment of better wages, and much to deserving charity.

While it is true that a large income is paid initially in the form of cash, it is equally true that the recipient of that income is absolutely bound to turn back a great part of his receipts for the purpose of carrying on and extending the enterprises in which he is interested. In other words, it is impossible for the recipient to pay out enormous sums in a cash tax without crippling his particular enterprise, which means, of course, crippling industry all over the country.

The precedent of England on this point is noteworthy. There people have been accustomed to an income tax for many years and have learned how to handle themselves so as to provide for it and pay it. Even so, however, the authorities there, because of their fear of killing industry, have not placed the tax on the highest incomes much above 40 per cent; and this in the third year of the war. The authorities there believe that if in the first year of the war they had raised income taxes to the extent proposed by the House of Representatives there would have been an industrial panic throughout England.

Mr. President, I wonder if the Members of the Senate appreciate the vast sum of money that is contributed by people of all means to charitable enterprises throughout the land. I have taken the trouble to investigate the matter, and am reliably informed that in New York City upward of $35,000,000 is given annually by the people of that city to its public and private charities; and this does not include the money contributed by the State and city governments or the support of the Rockefeller and Carnegie foundations. Already there is every evidence that the contributors to these charities will be compelled to materially reduce the sums they have given in the past, if not entirely withhold them.

Luxuries should be taxed. But let us take the provision in the revenue bill imposing a 5 per cent tax on the list cost of automobiles. This tax on automobiles, at the rate of production last year, would net the Government on passenger automobiles $60,000,000 and on trucks $10,000,000, a total of $70,000,000.

This tax would very materially hurt the automobile industry. The better plan would be to base the tax on the 3,250,000 pleasure cars now owned by individuals throughout the country, of an estimated average of 30 horsepower each. A tax of $1 per horsepower would produce approximately $100,000,000 and would not hurt the industry. Such a tax as this, while splendid in its total results, would not be too burdensome on anybody and would be paid by thousands of people who could readily afford to pay it.

No tax should be placed on automobile trucks, as they are utility machines and actually assist in increasing production.

It should be considered also that the data for collecting this tax on pleasure cars is easily obtainable through the license bureaus of the various States.

I fail to understand why the House neglected to place a stamp tax on bank checks and drafts. In the Spanish War this furnished a large source of revenue, and with the immense development of business in recent years it would at this time bring to the Treasury at least $10,000,000 annually.

The House bill provides a tax upon gross receipts in many enterprises. In some of the businesses affected this tax means confiscation, as does the increased postal rates to many publishers of the country. In lieu of this the Senate Finance Committee should go carefully into the consideration of levying a tax of one-half per cent upon all sales of every character. This tax could be collected either by requiring the placing of a stamp tax upon the goods disposed of, at the point of sale, or by payment on the total sales of each month. This would bring, as I estimate it, a yearly revenue of approximately $500,000,000.

This tax, with that levied on corporations and incomes, and an increased import tax on some of the more important commodities that are produced largely abroad, levied with the idea of avoiding injury to the industries of the country, would bring enough revenue to meet the demands of the country at this time.

A tax on luxuries is also desirable; it will curtail their use, limiting waste, and thus furnish labor and encourage industries for production of war necessities.

In my recent remarks on the bond issue, I stated that New York City would respond to the call of the country. The people of that metropolis have subscribed nearly 50 per cent of the bonds thus far sold, and will take at least that proportion of the whole issue.

Mr. President, I can assure the Senate that the whole financial community of the land is very anxious to help make this bond issue a tremendous success, but the administration must not be disappointed if it finds that the total of subscriptions in the first few weeks is not as heavy as they would have it, for there is bound to be a great deal of holding off all over the country by possible large subscribers, until the tax matter is definitely settled, and settled on a fair basis.

The people, institutions, private bankers, and others upon whom rests the responsibility of finding the money to carry on industry in this country, have a variety of burdens to carry which Congress may not fully appreciate. For instance, the people who finance our great enterprises usually have practically all their capital invested. They must quietly dispose of some of their present holdings, in order to have enough cash to become large subscribers to the new loan. Unfortunately, they have a very thin market to sell on. Their situation is very different from that of European investors, who, throughout the war, have had the splendid American market in which to dispose of securities; and, in fact, since the war began, they have unloaded in this country something like two and a half billions of American securities, putting the cash therefrom into their own Government bonds. Congress must also remember that American investors have no such source to which they may turn.

Congress must be careful not to alarm the investment community, thus leading to sacrifice of present holdings at present prices, and cause such a let-down in the security markets as would imperil the success of the liberty loan.

Just as soon as the war in Europe broke out, England and France lay down on the United States for all neutral Government financing, and have done so ever since. Thus American investors have been financing the neutral countries of the world. The obligation to continue those loans, not so much with respect to Europe's neutral countries as with respect to South America, is important. If American investors continue to carry the South American maturities when they fall due, it will mean another burden on them that England and France were unable to continue.

The Senate must take this into consideration in its taxation program and not tax the investors of the Nation so heavily as to make them throw up their hands and realize that it is impossible to support American industry by continued investment in it, and at the same time to support our commercial relations by continuing to lend to South America and the rest of the world, and to subscribe liberally to the liberty and succeeding loans.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CALDER. With pleasure.

Mr. BRADY. I should like to ask the Senator his opinion as to the amount of money that should be raised by taxation in comparison with the amount that should be raised by issuing bonds. I see that the Senator has given the matter careful study, and I note that he says that the people should not be taxed for the bonds that are issued to make foreign loans. I fully agree with him in that idea, and I understand that it is the consensus of opinion that to raise whatever money we loan to foreign Governments we should issue bonds. Deducting the amount that we will probably lend to the foreign nations, our allies, what percentage of the money that is found to be necessary to carry on this war should we issue bonds for, and what percentage does the Senator believe we should raise by taxation?

Mr. CALDER. In my judgment, Mr. President, we should not tax the people for more than one-fourth of the amount needed each year to carry on the war. In other words, if it is going to cost us $4,000,000,000 this year to conduct the war, we ought to borrow three billion of it and tax the people for one billion.

Mr. BRADY. I am glad to have the Senator's view about it.

Mr. CALDER. While I am on my feet I will say for the information of the Senator from Idaho that if we are required to raise only the $5,000,000,000 authorized by the issuance of bonds, this sum can be liquidated in 30 years by the payment of $271,000,000 a year, provided the interest rate does not exceed 3½ per cent.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question before he sits down. I understood him to say in the course of his very interesting remarks—with which I have not been able entirely to agree—that the tax on incomes fixed by the House was greater than the tax that England placed on incomes.

Mr. CALDER. On her incomes; yes.

Mr. KENYON. At this time?

Mr. CALDER. That is my information.

Mr. KENYON. What does the Senator estimate to be the tax now placed by England on incomes?

Mr. CALDER. My information is that it does not exceed 40 per cent.

Mr. KENYON. Is that limited to some particular amount of incomes?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; as I understand it, the income taxes levied in England vary, small incomes being taxed at a lower rate than large ones. The Senator from Iowa may have in mind the excess-profits tax. I am informed that large sums are obtained from this source, the tax being based upon the extent of the profits and upon the business in which the profits are obtained. I am told that as high as 75 per cent excess-profits tax has been levied against some concerns that have been manufacturing war materials.

Mr. KENYON. Does not the Senator believe that these great corporations that have made such tremendous sums out of manufacturing the materials necessary for the war ought to bear a very heavy burden of war taxation?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; and I think that that could be gotten at if, in arranging the excess-profits tax, we determined it largely upon the basis of the amount of money made recently in comparison with the amount of money earned prior to the war. I know of an ammunition company in my city that has for the past three years been paying to its stockholders 100 per cent. I would take 75 per cent away from that concern if I could do it.

Mr. KENYON. There is a certain powder company, I think, whose net profits have gone up from something like $4,000,000 to $80,000,000 in the last two years. Would not the Senator take a very large part of that profit?

Mr. CALDER. I would, indeed, and on the basis of the English or German system, whereby they figure the excess as the profits made since the war as against profits made before the war.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator feel that if the Congress takes a substantial percentage of the great incomes in this country—the incomes of over $100,000—Congress is injuring business by doing that?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; you can go too far, if we are to depend upon the business men of the country to purchase our bonds, finance the rest of the world, and provide for the normal extensions of business.

Mr. KENYON. Does not the Senator feel that the great incomes of this country have got to bear a very heavy proportion of the expenses of this war? Or will it cripple business?

Mr. CALDER. In answer to the Senator, I will say that a levy of 40 per cent upon incomes exceeding $500,000 is a very large tax in the first year of the war. As I have indicated in my remarks, very few men spend more than $100,000 a year for their actual living expenses, and the rest is used for the necessary development of industry.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator believe that in times of war anybody ought to expend $100,000 a year for his living expenses when people are going hungry in this country?

Mr. CALDER. Well, I will say to the Senator that $100,000 is a great deal of money, quite enough for anyone to live on. I know that out in the Senator's State there are some incomes of that size, and there are a great many in my State. I want to make it plain that I think it would be a great injury to the business of this Nation if in the first year of the war the Government levied a tax that would take anywhere near all of the incomes of people earning more than $100,000 a year.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator, just briefly, how he thinks the expenses of this war should be paid?

Mr. CALDER. I would levy an excess profits tax, based upon the English or German systems, on all of the corporations that make extraordinary sums of money during the war in comparison with their earnings before the war. I would materially increase the income taxes. I would levy a tax on luxuries—a larger tax than we now have. I would put a tax on bank checks. I would put a larger tariff tax on many commodities imported, and, with increased taxes on liquors and cigars, we would have quite enough—approximately $1,000,000,000—which is all that we ought to raise by taxation this year for war purposes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Government is spending over seven billions. What are you going to do with that?

Mr. CALDER. I have no information that we will spend much over $4,000,000,000 this year. If we are going to spend $7,000,000,000, as the Senator indicates, then we must find other sources of taxation. I have suggested that the Finance Committee take under advisement levying a tax of one-half of 1 per cent on all sales. Gentlemen who have studied the figures tell me that by this means alone we could raise at least $500,000,000 annually.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Sales of every kind?

Mr. CALDER. Of every kind.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That puts the tax upon the poorer classes of the people, does it not? But there is where the burden of this war will ultimately fall—upon the aching stoop of the man who toils.

Mr. CALDER. Well, if a man is earning $1,000 a year and purchases a thousand dollars' worth of goods for the support of his family, his tax would be $5. He could bear that.

JOHN HENRY WHITLEY,

Mr. VARDAMAN. At the request of the chairman of the committee, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Saturday, May 26, 1917) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 28, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

In the crucial test through which the world is passing help us as a people to continue to answer the call from our allies across the sea, that righteousness may be vindicated and truth sustained, that the world may continue to answer to the calls of duty until a civilization shall be maintained and established which shall insure peace and tranquillity. And Thine be the praise. In His Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the war-revenue bill by inserting an article recently written by Otto Kahn, of New York, and published in the New York Times of May 21, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 328) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, in respect of car service, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 282. An act providing for the purchase or condemnation of a site for a target range at or near Great Piece Meadows, in the State of New Jersey.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On May 12, 1917:

S. 1845. An act to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Oweera; and

S. J. Res. 42. Joint resolution authorizing the President to take over for the United States possession and title of any vessel within its jurisdiction which at the time of coming therein was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war, or was under register of any such nation, and for other purposes.

On May 22, 1917:

S. 1006. An act authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county;

S. 1007. An act authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place; and

S. J. Res. 61. Joint resolution to grant authority for the erection of temporary buildings at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

URGENT DEFICIENCIES (H. REPT. NO. 61).

Mr. FITZGERALD. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report back the bill H. R. 3971, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, on account of war expenses, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman desire to do with it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Refer it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It is ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman say when he probably will call it up?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to say that I expect to call this bill up Monday about 2 o'clock p. m. It is impossible for me to be here before that time on Monday, but the amendments should be acted upon on Monday, so that the bill may go to conference.

Mr. MANN. Is it likely that the House will finish the consideration of the bill during Monday and Tuesday?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It should do so, unless a very unusual amount of time is taken up on the Senate amendments. With the exception of Senate amendment No. 2, known as the emergency shipping fund, which gives the power and the appropriation to obtain about 3,000,000 tons of shipping in the next three months, the amendments are of a character which the House usually consents to have go to conference without previous discussion. This amendment may take some time in its consideration, but I do not believe under any circumstances it should take two days.

Mr. MANN. I should think so, too. A great many Members would like to know whether the House will be in session on Wednesday next, Memorial Day.

ADJOURNMENT OVER MEMORIAL DAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns Tuesday, May 29, it adjourn until 12 o'clock m. Thursday, May 31.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns Tuesday it adjourn until Thursday, May 31, at 12 o'clock noon. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

URGENT DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I understand the conferees on the part of the House have been holding some hearings on this bill, and I want to inquire whether they will be ready for us at the time the gentleman calls up this report?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations have been holding hearings on matters connected with the Senate amendments. The hearings are of a dual character. Some of the statements on some matters are of a highly confidential character, and that information is not for public discussion or diffusion. The committee has taken a very considerable amount of testimony upon the activities and work of the Advisory Board of the Council of National Defense. It is believed that the information that has been obtained will be of very great value from many standpoints, and the committee expects to have it in print and available for the use of the Members by Monday morning.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I see from the papers that there is a switch from a fleet built of wood, which would very materially affect the lumber industry, to steel ships, and I want to inquire whether the hearings treated of that subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The information on that question will be placed at the disposal of the House.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. If the gentleman will yield, I will say that I read in the paper this morning what the gentleman is probably alluding to. The information was in a speech made by Gen. Goethals. I called up Mr. Denman, the head of the Shipping Board, and he told me that the Shipping Board is not to build all the ships out of steel, but will go ahead with the program and build some of the boats out of wood and the others out of steel, so as to get the ships as soon as possible.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The information will be available. Gen. Goethals said before the committee that he thought at present the number of wooden ships would necessarily be limited to 150 and 200. That information will be placed at the disposal of the House. There are some matters connected with the policy involved in the construction of the ships that should not be publicly discussed.

Mr. DRANE. Can you state whether it is the policy of this board to proceed with the building of these wooden ships at this time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is. I can say to the gentlemen that they are perfecting plans to go ahead to the extent of one hundred and fifty to two hundred 3,000-ton wooden ships at this time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I ask the gentleman a question? Gen. Goethals is quoted as saying that he found that contracts had been let for which there were no specifications.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that the statement in the press is inaccurate. A number of conferences had been arranged, but no definite arrangements of any kind had been made, and the statement in to-day's press to which the gentleman refers must be an inaccurate report of what Gen. Goethals said, having in mind what he stated in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SLAYDEN. May I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would Gen. Goethals have anything to do with the letting of contracts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The idea is to let the entire work of building the ships to Gen. Goethals.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It strikes me that there might be a modicum of truth in that report, in that Gen. Goethals will have charge of the construction, but other people will let contracts for the ships to be constructed under the direction of Gen. Goethals. That might make the report accurate.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Do I understand my colleague to say, and also the gentleman from Mississippi, that they called up the department and ascertained that they propose to build some wooden and some steel ships?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; that is the advice I have from the department.

INVESTIGATION OF PNEUMATIC MAIL-TUBE SERVICE.

Mr. BELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. BELL. To ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution 66 and that the resolution be immediately considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution 66 and that the same be immediately considered.

Mr. COX. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what does it refer to?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 66) making immediately available moneys appropriated for the investigation of the pneumatic mail-tube service in the act approved March 3, 1917.

Resolved, etc., That the appropriation for the investigation of the pneumatic mail-tube service, under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1917, be and the same is hereby, made immediately available.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REGISTRATION DAY, JUNE 5.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial on registration on June 5, as published in the Miami Metropolis.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an editorial on registration day, as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the editorial referred to:

[From the Miami Metropolis, Monday, May 21, 1917.]

JUNE 5 NO OCCASION FOR JUBILATION.

Tuesday, June 5, is the day fixed in President Wilson's proclamation for the registration of all men in the United States who have passed their twenty-first and have not reached their thirty-first birthday.

Only one day will be permitted for this registration, and all citizens are called upon to assist in getting the lists completed by sundown of that day. Persons too sick to present themselves for registration must send a competent person to the county clerk on May 24, and the clerk will give instructions for registration; and persons who expect to be out of town on June 5 are also ordered to secure from the county clerk registration cards on May 24 and mail them to the registrars in their precincts so as to be included in the regular registration lists on June 5.

In Dade County there should be an effort to get this registration done early in the day of June 5. It would be creditable for this county—and for every county in the United States—to try to get this duty performed in the shortest time possible and with the quiet soberness that is befitting the occasion.

Signing up their lives for cannon feed, if need be; signing away their privilege to lives of their own choosing; signing away their opportunity for peaceful homes and happy associations with those they love; signing away their chances for the fulfillment of their ambitions; signing up their all for their country, these men should be honored by the rightful attitude on the part of the people who by the luck of age or infirmity are not required to offer themselves for conscription.

Let there be no jubilation on that day. It is not a day for gayety and holiday crowds. It is not a time for bands and parades and wordy oratory. It, above everything else, is a day for prayer, heartfelt appeals to the Ruler of this universe, that somehow that hideous conflict across the sea may be ended before sons of peace-loving America can be called into service.

In Dade County let there be an earnest determination to make a record for prompt registration. Let every man within the ages specified go early to the registration place in his precinct and get the duty done with. Let the proceeding be marked by respectful sympathy for the families of these men, not by the cheap "patriotism" of holiday crowds and brass-band music and spell-binding orators.

Thousands of the men who will register that day, while willing to serve their country in any way they are called to serve, feel no enthusiasm for this war. If there had been universal enthusiasm for this war there would have been no need of this draft plan. And to endeavor to inject enthusiasm at a time when every honest thinker knows that men are signing up their lives for military service for no reason except that it has been asked of them by the country to which they owe allegiance smacks of hypocrisy and tawdry jingoism.

Let the day be an occasion for sober meditation and kind thoughts for those who are placing duty above happiness and peace. Let each precinct vie with its neighboring precincts in completing the registration early in the day, and let a great prayer go up from every home in the United States that this registration duty will be the only one demanded of the country's young manhood—a prayer for a conclusion of the war in Europe before our boys can be called into service.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LONGWORTH, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. TILSON, for three days, on account of official business.

To Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina, for three days, on account of official business.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4188.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4188) for the distribution of agricultural products. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4188, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that when the committee rose on yesterday several amendments were pending, among them one offered by the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. LEVER. Section 5 of the bill had been read, but I do not recall that any amendment was pending to that section. I think an amendment was to be offered as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that there was no amendment pending to that section of the bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: On page 4, at the end of section 5, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for nitrate of soda necessary for the production of food or feed crops he is authorized to purchase such nitrate of soda, store it, and sell it to the farmers at cost, including transportation and all other expenses, such cost price to be payable in advance. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal a supply of nitrate of soda to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture in such quantities, at such times, and at such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable. Upon failure of the person to comply with such requirement the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to requisition and take possession of such nitrate of soda and pay for it at the price so determined. If the price so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid for such nitrate of soda on delivery the amount prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation for such nitrate of soda; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the Secretary of the Navy or any other agency of the Government, and for such purpose there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000. Any moneys received by the United States from the sale of nitrate of soda to farmers under this section may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make a point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What is the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That it is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I submit to the Chair that this amendment is germane to this bill. Under the rule, a general subject may be amended by a specific proposition of the same class. The general subject of this bill is certainly the increase of the food supply of this country.

I know that the subject matter of a bill is not necessarily covered by the title of the bill; it may or may not be properly stated in the title. But the title of this bill is, "To stimulate agriculture." The first section of the bill provides for the more effective carrying on of the war with Germany. How? By increased production. It gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the powers thereinafter provided. There are four or five sections of the bill providing different methods, each method tending only to one common object, namely, the increased production of foodstuffs in this country. If the subject matter of this bill is not the increased production of foodstuffs, then there is no subject matter to it. In section 4 of the bill, page 3, the increased production is provided for by the purchase and distribution of seeds. In section 9—and I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the language of section 9, page 6—on line 5, the bill reads as follows:

For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others, $4,500,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I should move to strike out all after the word "production," in line 5, and substitute therefor language that would cause the paragraph to read as follows: "For increasing food production the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to procure and sell at cost nitrate of soda, $4,500,000," would it not be in order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Would it not be germane to the paragraph which provides for increasing food production? And if it is germane to that, then it is germane as a separate section, as a specific proposition of the same general class.

Now, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask him a question right there?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. On that paragraph that the gentleman is discussing, while it does not provide directly for increasing food production, it provides for it by a specific method, by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents, and others.

Now, does the gentleman think his amendment would be germane to that provision?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I contend that the fact that the bill provides one certain method does not preclude the possibility of any Member of the House suggesting another method or an additional method. Are we to be limited entirely to the method provided by the committee for increasing production? Is it to be declared that there is no possibility of securing consideration of a method other than that which is provided by the committee, or of an additional method? If so, it is impossible to suggest any amendment for increasing food production that would be held germane. The subject matter of every section in this bill is the increase of food production. That is only one method in this section. There are a number of other methods suggested. Now, the method contained in this amendment is simply an additional method to that which is provided in the bill. I know that the Chair on the day before yesterday cited two or three decisions tending to suggest that a subject might be related and yet not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman proceeds the Chair wishes to ask another question. Does the gentleman think it would be germane to this bill to submit by way of amendment a proposition for the Government to buy land and sell it at cost on credit under the guise of stimulating production, or to irrigate land, or to buy horses and mules and wagons and plows and sell to farmers?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If that proposition were submitted, clearly the Agricultural Committee would not have jurisdiction over the subject of irrigating land. That would be one test of germaneness. You might go on and suggest any other number of things; but here is a proposition which is distinctly germane, because it is supplemental to the other methods increasing the food supply by the purchase of seeds, by establishing a survey, by providing educational and administrational methods. A proposition to irrigate arid lands could not go to the Agricultural Committee, which would have no jurisdiction of the subject; but it would have jurisdiction of the subject of nitrate of soda. Now, day before yesterday, in rendering a decision as to the germaneness of a proposition, the Chair said that he was influenced by the decision cited in the manual where an amendment was offered to a bill regulating interstate commerce as to the control of intrastate commerce. But clearly that is an entirely different proposition. The subjects are distinctive. It is not as in this case, where the one subject is the increased production of the food supply.

The Chair also called attention to the fact that to a bill proposing the admission of one Territory an amendment proposing the admission of another Territory was not germane. That is true; but it has been held that where two or more Territories were provided for in a bill and a general class was thereby established a specific proposition adding another Territory to the general class is in order.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that on any question affecting the germaneness of an amendment great discretion necessarily rests with the Chair. The Chair is not bound by any hard and fast precedents, because necessarily each proposition must be considered upon its merits and must appeal in great measure to the common sense and discretion of the Chair. Now, I do not believe the Chair will say that the subject matter of this bill is not the increase of the food supply of this country. If that is once established as the subject matter of the bill, there can be no doubt as to the germaneness of this amendment as a specific proposition to be added to a general subject of the same class.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] desire to be heard?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the rule of germaneness is that the proposed amendment is one which reasonably and logically and necessarily would be suggested in connection with the bill under consideration. An examination of this bill would not suggest anything in connection with it which contemplated the purchase of nitrate of soda or of any other form of fertilizer in order to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to engage in the business of selling fertilizer to farmers. It is as if it were suggested that provision be made for the reclamation of these lands, or for their drainage, or for some other purpose that might aid in the stimulation of production, but yet not so related to the method contained in the bill as to make it germane.

The Chair called the gentleman's attention to the fact that on page 6, in the paragraph for increasing food production and eliminating waste, the provision was confined to educational and demonstrational methods, and that any suggested method for the increasing of food production would not necessarily be germane unless related to those two methods of increasing food production. In answer to the suggestion of the Chair about reclamation, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] urged that that was a subject over which the Committee on Agriculture did not have jurisdiction. But it has been held time and again that the mere fact that a committee has jurisdiction over a subject does not make a proposition affecting such subject necessarily germane to the provisions of a particular bill. This amendment is to introduce into this bill legislation upon a subject matter entirely foreign to anything enumerated or found in it and which is unrelated to it. If it would be in order to propose that authority be given to purchase nitrate of soda, authority could be proposed to be given for the purchase of any character of fertilizer or for the cooperation of any other department of the Government. It seems to me that under the well-established rules and practice of the House of Representatives the subject matter of this amendment is not germane to the subject matter of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair realizes that it is not always an easy matter to determine just what is germane and what is not. This amendment is not offered as an amendment to any particular section in the bill, but as a new section. The Chair also realizes that there is a well-established principle that one individual proposition may not be amended by adding another individual proposition. That was true in the case that the Chair passed upon the other day, cited by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The Chair is also aware of the fact that a single proposition may be added to a general proposition if it is otherwise germane. The Chair is not prepared to discuss generally the rules governing the proposition of germaneness, except in a general way, but will offer this suggestion: The Chair thinks in order to be germane to the subject matter of the bill an amendment must relate directly to something in the bill, and is not germane simply because it relates to some similar subject, or to the same kind of a subject covered by the bill. It seems to the Chair that if this amendment should be held germane it would throw open the floodgates. In other words, if this amendment is germane, then a proposition for the Government to purchase mules or horses or wagons or plows or harrows, or even land itself, or to reclaim land, and sell these things to the farmer at cost would be germane, because that might tend generally to stimulate agriculture or the production of food products. If this is germane, either one of those other propositions would unquestionably be germane, and the Chair does not think that the bill contemplates anything of the kind. The Chair realizes that it is rather a close question, and he realizes that he may be wrong, and would be glad to leave it to the judgment of the committee. If the gentleman desires to appeal from the decision, the Chair would be very glad to have him do so. But it is the opinion of the Chair that the amendment is not in order on this bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] had an amendment printed in the RECORD for information, which he desires to offer.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which was read last night.

The Clerk began the reading of the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the reading of the amendment so far shows that it is subject to a point of order, and inasmuch as it is printed in the RECORD it is not necessary that it should be read again, and I make the point of order.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk. The amendment reserves to the Secretary of Agriculture the right to cooperate with such State and local officials and with such public agencies as he thinks necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Clerk report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 22, after the word "public," strike out the words "and private agencies or person" and insert the word "agencies."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment that it comes too late, that we have already passed section 5.

Mr. MANN. No; we quit on section 5 last night.

Mr. LEVER. But an amendment was offered as a new section.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania gave notice that he desired to offer an amendment to section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. There was a new section offered, to which the point of order was sustained, but the Chair thinks the gentleman's amendment is in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the amendment, as I stated, reserves to the Secretary of Agriculture the right to cooperate with such State and local officials and with such public agencies as he thinks necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. But it strikes out the authority for him to cooperate with private agencies or persons. It has been stated in debate during the last few days that it is expected that many persons will volunteer their services to the Secretary of Agriculture to assist persons whom he may appoint, who will serve the Government without compensation in an effort to conserve the food supply, and otherwise assist in bringing down the price of foodstuffs to the people. There is a wide diversity of opinion as to whether there is a scarcity of foodstuffs in the country at this time. Perhaps it is not the time to engage the services of too many persons who are willing to serve for nothing who happen to know a great deal about business, and may perchance have some personal interest in the market the Government is creating.

It has been suggested in the matter of copper, which it is said the Government was able to secure by reason of the activity of some of these volunteer agents at 16 cents a pound, that 8 cents a pound, or certainly 12 cents a pound, would have been a good price—the inference being that some patriotic efforts are not so patriotic when it comes to the matter of disposing of commodities to the Government.

In the matter of food, to which this bill pertains, concerning which I would advise the Secretary to steer clear of too many uncompensated advisers, the Attorney General of the United States in an official statement, under date of May 17, says:

I am not an authority on foodstuffs of the country; that belongs properly to the Department of Agriculture, but I am led to believe from the reports submitted to me—

And he is the officer of the Government who knows whether there are any trusts or combinations in restraint of trade—that there is much hysteria occasioned by the reports of food shortage. It is ridiculous to think that there will be starvation or want in this country. There will be sufficient food.

Now, that comes from an officer of the Government, a member of the President's Cabinet, who says that it is ridiculous to assume that there is going to be a shortage of food, and yet at the same time we read from the Price Current——

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. In connection with the statement that the gentleman just read, will the gentleman read the statement made by another member of the Cabinet?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will read from a statement made by Secretary Redfield, of the Department of Commerce, who, in advising the people to do more gardening, says: "I am fond of roses, but potatoes are more needed now."

Mr. RUBEY. Does not he state that we are in need of foodstuffs?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but there is a difference of opinion between these two learned members of the President's Cabinet——

Mr. RUBEY. One says that the shortage is not going to be great, and the other says that it is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Attorney General, who knows about trusts and combinations, and who keeps in touch as to whether the people are unduly short of foodstuffs, says that it is ridiculous to think that there will be starvation in this country.

Mr. RUBEY. The Secretary of Commerce, who is engaged in familiarizing himself with trade throughout the world, says that there will be a great shortage.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Attorney General thinks it is a matter of transportation more than anything else, and in a way I agree with him. I know that foodstuffs would be cheaper, especially in the cities, if so many cars were not held up carrying munitions of war.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be defeated. I do not know that this language carries any additional authority to the Secretary of Agriculture. On the contrary, I am satisfied that the Secretary of Agriculture now has authority to undertake the cooperative arrangements that he may think necessary in carrying on the work provided for under this act. A few years ago we inserted in one of the great Agricultural appropriation bills language with reference to one bureau of the department to this effect:

Provided, That the expense of such service shall be defrayed from this appropriation and such cooperative funds as may be voluntarily contributed by State, county, and municipal agencies, associations of farmers, and individual farmers, universities, colleges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, other local associations of business men, business organizations, and individuals witnin the State.

That language applies to only one feature of the work of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman briefly state, excluding the last two lines of the paragraph, 24 and 25, what power the balance of the section confers on the Secretary of Agriculture that he does not now possess?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think, as a matter of fact, as I was endeavoring to say, that it confers on the Secretary any power that he does not now have.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Nor do I.

Mr. LEVER. But this is the thought: When we put this language which I have just read in the Agricultural appropriation bill some few years ago the Secretary of Agriculture adopted the policy, believing it was the wish of Congress, that he would not cooperate with outside agencies except as provided in the annual appropriation act. Because he has been following that policy this provision is in the bill to give the Secretary of Agriculture congressional sanction to cooperate with every kind of agency that he thinks he can use for the benefit of the country in working out the plans contemplated under this bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Without this language is it the gentleman's opinion that the Secretary would not cooperate with these agencies?

Mr. LEVER. My judgment is that if this language were stricken out the Secretary of Agriculture would take it to mean that the Congress did not desire him to cooperate except as he now is cooperating, in a very limited way. If the language stays in the bill, it is an indication to the Secretary of Agriculture that Congress is granting him its consent—not exactly its consent either, but is saying to him that it is willing that he should cooperate, giving him direction to cooperate, in the very broadest manner.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then, to retain this language in effect will be to cast a vote of confidence in the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. Not exactly that, either.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not like the language at all, but if it will do what the gentleman says, I shall vote for it.

Mr. LEVER. As I say, Congress itself limited in one bureau of the Department of Agriculture the kind of cooperation it could set up in doing its work. The Secretary of Agriculture, acting upon that thought, conformed his cooperative efforts to the will of Congress as expressed in that one section. This is merely the secretary's coming here and asking us to give him legislative sanction to cooperate in the broadest way with individuals and agencies of all descriptions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not this the paragraph and are not these the particular words under which it is proposed to nominate an administrator of the food supply?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But if another bill which the gentleman has in mind should fail, would there not be sufficient power in this paragraph for the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint the food administrator?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think that the Secretary of Agriculture would stretch his power to do anything like that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I merely call the attention of the gentleman and of the House to the language of the paragraph:

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with such State and local officials, and with such public and private agencies, or persons as he finds necessary, and to make such rules and regulations.

And so forth.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That would not authorize him to create a food administrator.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment ought not to prevail. We know that in many of the States organizations have been effected for the very purpose of cooperating with the Secretary of Agriculture in these matters, and those organizations are not public agencies, but are private. In some of the States they have been appointed by the governors, but not authorized by law, and they would not be public agencies. In some places they are appointed by the mayors of the different cities, but they are not authorized by law. I doubt if they would be recognized by the Secretary if this amendment prevails. They are organizing all over the country for efficiency, for cooperation in this important work. Many organizations of that kind have been effected, and they are private agencies, private persons, able to do good work.

It seems to me the Secretary of Agriculture ought to have authority to call upon them to help him. He might possibly have authority, as the chairman of the committee suggests, under some other law or under his general power and authority, but this would be a direction to him not to exercise that authority. It seems to me that it would be unwise.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that with the army of employees we now have, with agents, field agents, inspectors, and all sorts of officers, the Secretary of Agriculture is able to get all of the information that he wants, plus such as he can get through the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Statistics, without going to this great additional expense, and if he can not do as they have done in the Department of Agriculture in reference to cotton, with which I am familiar, go to the merchants and dealers and producers and get this information without any further creation of officials or further lodging of power?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. This is an emergency, and nothing of the kind has ever arisen before, making necessary work of a kind and to an extent never imposed upon the Secretary of Agriculture before, and it has been found necessary to recognize and prepare to cooperate with and to accept the services of these private associations throughout the country. It seems to me the suggestion the gentleman from Texas makes that the Secretary confine himself to talking to merchants and dealers would not meet the situation at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman perhaps misunderstood me. I did not suggest that the Secretary should confine himself to a discussion with or inquiries of merchants and dealers.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Pardon me, but probably the gentleman from Texas thinks that we are still talking about this food-survey section of the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. We are talking now about the general workings of this bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We are talking about section 5.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. HELM. The word "cooperate" in this section is not used in the sense of employing somebody and paying a salary, but in the sense of working in connection with persons who are now working in the same line of business. Is not that the correct interpretation of the language?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the gentleman is right about that, although this is to be in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I do not know that he would in no case employ anyone. This simply authorizes him to act with these associations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not admit of the employment of numerous persons at $1 a year, which is an objectionable feature in the minds of many?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not know why it is objectionable at this time and in the particular kind provided for in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We abolished it in the matter of educators a short time ago.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes; because there was a vicious practice connected with that. A private organization in this country handling immense sums of money had offered the Secretary of Agriculture a large amount of money for the employment of men on condition that the officers of that private organization were permitted to name the men. And they were actually undertaking, through the agricultural colleges and the Department of Agriculture, to employ and send over the country a lot of their men to disseminate their doctrines; and if men were employed and paid in this way—the department paying each man $1 per year and the private organization the remainder—they would have the dignity and authority of the department while actually representing private interests.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the members of the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association offered their services at $1 per annum, what is the difference? Is not that a vicious proposition—men engaged in business offering their services to the Government for nothing, when they are engaged in the business of selling commodities to the Government?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman confuses this bill with the bill H. R. 4630, the food-control bill. This bill relates to nothing but the food survey and to accelerating and increasing the production of foodstuffs. It has nothing whatever to do with the matter the gentleman has talked about so much.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KING and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas rose.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could not limit debate on this. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to be heard?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I wanted to direct the attention of the——

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 40 minutes. I am inclined to be liberal with the time on this, as it may save time. I ask that it be yielded to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. DIES; the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. ASWELL; the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HEFLIN; the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. RUCKER; the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. NORTON; the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. KING; the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN; the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. CAMPBELL; and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. SLAYDEN; and that I have five minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. I wish to offer an amendment. May I have it read now?

Mr. KING. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I hope that this discussion will be limited strictly to this section and amendments thereto. Yesterday we wandered far afield and discussed everything, charges against public officials and other things, and I surmise there are some gentlemen that want to speak now who will want to make explanations. And I judge by the explanations that have been made heretofore, some one will have to explain some of the explanations.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want some explanation as to this bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the gentleman would remain here he would get the explanation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have heard no one on this committee who has been able to explain this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. What is the proposition?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 50 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest the gentleman make it 60 minutes. I would like 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 50 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Close at 2 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. Reserving the right to object, may my colleague have 10 minutes of that time?

Mr. LEVER. The time has been agreed to. I think there are five minutes left.

Mr. HAUGEN. May I have five minutes?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] is recognized.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I propose to speak, if permitted to do so, for a moment or two, strictly to the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The purpose of his amendment, as he has indicated to the committee, is to prevent the appointment of a food dictator. Now, Mr. Chairman, if that is the purpose of the amendment it ought to be voted down without any hesitancy on the part of this committee. If anything is needed in this country to-day it is an absolute dictator of food. I have just received this morning, for instance, a communication from an organization of soft-coal miners in the State of Illinois stating that if the Government did not do something immediately to relieve the food situation in this country that they themselves would take the matter into their own hands. I also received another communication from the city of Farmington, from an organization of 500 miners, who state they are not getting enough wages to live upon, and that if the Government and Congress does not give them immediate relief they will take the matter into their own hands.

I received this communication this morning, which I will read, from a most conservative place—the city of Galesburg, where I live—from a business man, showing the situation there. He says:

GALESBURG, ILL., May 1, 1917.

Hon. E. J. KING, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The people here unanimously demand a food dictator and demand that he be appointed quick. There are mutterings among the people, who are struggling to keep body and soul together at these high prices, that bodes ill to patriotism and the country unless Congress acts at once.

Very truly, yours, F. W. ROCKWELL.

And for that very reason, Mr. Chairman, if this portion of this bill will permit the appointment of a food dictator in this country, I claim that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be voted down.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman approve of the appointment of a myriad of business men at $1 per annum under this paragraph?

Mr. KING. No. I think the matter ought to be held largely under the control of the officials of this Government, but I can see no reason why some man like Mr. Hoover, who is familiar with the situation in other countries, should not be given the control.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman favor the mixing of wheat flour with corn and serving that out to the people for bread?

Mr. KING. We may have to do it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is in another bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask the gentleman whether we are not likely to have bad effects from building up false hopes of what a food dictator would be able to do, if that is the spirit throughout the country, demanding that we have food dictators because conditions are not as they ought to be? Does not the gentleman think that the appointment of a food dictator will ultimately produce a bad effect because he will not be able to do what these people think he ought to do?

Mr. KING. No. I believe it will give confidence in the hearts of the people that they will not be starved to death. The intimation is given out now that they will be starved. We are at war with starvation. They call it a "war of democracy," but I say it is a war of the human race against starvation.

Mr. FESS. I will say that confidence is but a poor diet for a man's stomach.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Does the gentleman think Mr. Hoover is a man of experience along that line—a man with experience along the mining line?

Mr. KING. Well, there are a lot of lawyers experienced along the line of law business, and they have made good in other lines.

Mr. BURNETT. And does the gentleman think a blacksmith might?

Mr. KING. Yes; I think a blacksmith might, and there was once a carpenter who made good.

Mr. HOWARD. As to Mr. Hoover, he was administering a charity over in Europe, but this is a free people that he has to deal with here.

Mr. HAUGEN. Rather than the appointment of a dictator, would it not be better to do away with the conspirators?

Mr. KING. Yes. I believe the people will wipe them off the face of the earth in a few months if the present conditions go on.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman believe we ought to let ourselves get into a condition where we will have a food dictator surrounded by food conspirators?

Mr. KING. I did not vote against the gentleman yesterday on that proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman thinks a food dictator could be appointed under the provisions of this paragraph?

Mr. KING. It seems to me possible to do so, and therefore I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the remarks of my colleague [Mr. KING]. I can not agree with him as broadly as he puts the various propositions, especially the one about a food dictator.

Now, what is the fact? One-third of the people are farmers. They can be exempted under the draft law by the President. So can the miner and the railroad man and various other people. It is necessary, I presume, for that authority to exist and to be used by the President.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield just now. I may a little later. Now, then, why all this trouble about the regulation of the prices of food? If the laws that we now have against conspiracies could be executed, speculation in food could be prevented. [Applause.]

Did you ever stop to think that two-thirds of our people are not farmers? The farmers are their customers. The constituents of my colleague are largely farmers, and so are mine. Is anybody agonizing about this $10 pair of shoes that I have on? [Laughter.] The miner has to buy the shoes and clothing and many other things that other people produce, and the truth of the matter is that there has been as much of an advance in prices of other products as there has been in the price of the farmers' products. If you are going to have a dictator for one-third of the people, why not have dictators for the other two-thirds? [Applause.]

The men in the city are agonizing, you know; the business men, by telegrams, by letters, agonizing. They say "Great Heavens! The price of food is intolerable; let us have a dictator." Do not you know there is the selfishness coming out—"Me and my wife and my son John and his wife, and us four, and no more, and all for all glory"—and the farmer does not seem to come in at all. [Laughter.] If you are going to dictate the price of his product, you have got also to dictate the price of the labor that he pays to produce it.

Let us get rid of this hysteria, this foolishness that abounds in the newspapers, that abounds in Congress, that abounds in the pulpit. If we are going to have as a war measure universal control by an autocrat—and I am not speaking disrespectfully of the present President or anybody else—let us have it operate all along the line. [Applause.] For me, I am willing to try, without lodging this immense authority that is winked at in this bill and which is to be followed by a more severe bill later on. I am willing that the law known as the law of supply and demand shall operate, with enforcement of the law against conspiracy to stop production or to bull prices. If you want to give somebody jurisdiction to control the farmers' products and prices, then give him jurisdiction—autocratic jurisdiction, if you please—to control prices of all products and all who produce those products. [Applause.]

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the Congress, I have no doubt that it is true, as the Secretary of Agriculture says, that there is, or is likely to be, a food shortage in this country due to the short crop, and due to the fact that our exports abroad to our allies must be greater than in normal times. But that is no reason for all the foolish laws about to be enacted, or for all the foolish statements being made in Congress and in the press with regard to farmers and food production.

My good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] wants to encourage food production by a $2.50 tax on cotton, which would affect one of the most important agricultural products of the country. My friend from Illinois wants to encourage beef production by requiring the farmers to keep their cattle until they get to a certain age. Somebody wants to encourage the conservation of wheat by reducing the price from $3 to $1 a bushel, as if that would conserve it. The truth about the business is that foolish and idle things are being said, and the country is in danger of having foolish and idle laws thrust upon it. Why, there is just so much wheat. Do you think that people are not eating it fast enough? I thought the argument was that they were about to eat up the old crop before the new crop could be harvested. Well, if they are eating it as fast as they are now at $3 a bushel, how fast would they eat it at $1 a bushel? [Laughter.] You want them to stop killing calves because they will grow up to be cows. Well, quit eating eggs, because they will become hens if you set them under some other hen. [Laughter.] Quit eating squabs and let them grow to be pigeons. Quit eating pigs' feet and wait till the pigs grow to be 400-pound porkers. [Laughter.] Do not eat roasting ears, but wait till they get to be hard corn. [Laughter.] Have some sense. If you let the farmers of America alone with your foolish laws and your foolish talk, they will come to the rescue of America and of Europe and produce the food for you. [Applause.] You will not get them to make more cottonseed oil and cottonseed meal to feed the world by offering an amendment to tax cotton $2.50 a bale. You will not get them to take better care of their cows and calves by telling them that you are going to see that they keep Old Bully on hand till he is 10 years old rather than kill him as a calf. [Laughter.] You are not going to encourage the wheat farmer to march earlier to the field with his team, to fertilize the earth, to call his family to the plow and the hoe, to make the wheat and the corn by threatening to curtail the price of his wheat.

Why, my friends, if you want to conserve the supply of food on hand, we will take wheat as an illustration; when wheat is worth a dollar a bushel we feed it to our chickens because it is good chicken feed, and we throw the broken bread from the table to our neighbor's dog, and we eat bread in abundance. When wheat is $3 a bushel we do not feed it to the chickens. We feed them on cheaper chicken feed, and we save the ends of the bread and put milk on them and make milk toast. We conserve the supply. Let me tell you, nothing is stimulating production in this country like high prices. City folks are being converted into farmers. Farmers are planting their fence corners in grain and food, while you talk about tinkering with them, about putting a damper upon their energy and industry. [Applause.] High prices are the greatest reward and the greatest stimulus to food production in the world and low prices are the greatest stimulus to food consumption. If you bring down the price that the farmer receives you curtail production by deadening his energy and you increase consmption by making food cheaper to everybody who wants to buy it. You are not going to hurt the farmer by your foolish laws or your foolish talk, but you are going to hurt the city folks, who want cheap food. Land has been broken to the plow this year that has lain fallow for many years. Men are marching steadfastly from daylight till dark in the furrows in this country who have not been in the fields before for decades. Just let them alone, Mr. Tinkerman, and let them work out the salvation of this country without your attempting to fix the prices for their food products. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, there is a shortage of food products in the United States and throughout the world. There are some 300,000,000 bushels of wheat locked up in Russia, that can not reach those who ordinarily would consume it, on account of blockade. The wheat crop in the United States was more than 400,000,000 bushels short. Millions of men for the past two years and a half have been taken from the productive activities to destructive war. This creates a situation that gives theorists who have been attempting to foist their theories and themselves upon the country for years an opportunity to get a day in the Congress of the United States. They have had their day before the Committee on Agriculture, and they have that committee. The committee is here with a bill giving them what they have wanted for years. They get $18,500,000 out of the Treasury. What will the people of the Untied States get for that $18,500,000?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No. They will get a food survey that will be completed after it is too late to be utilized. They will have foisted upon the country over 7,500 men who ought to be engaged in producing something to eat. They will be paid salaries on an average of from $1,800 to $2,500 a year. What I want the Committee on Agriculture to do is to show what the people of the United States are to get for this $18,500,000 of money. The people need bread and meat. What are you giving them? An army of investigators and of theorists. What the farmers need are hands to help till the soil, to produce something to eat.

Mr. BURNETT. Does my colleague think these surveyors have produced anything, or ever will produce anything?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Probably not. And they ought not to be paid from $1,800 to $2,500 a year by people who do produce things.

Mr. BURNETT. Why not conscript them to go to war? [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not so sure but they would be of more service conscripted as farm hands, and I am sure they will be of no service whatever to the producers of the country or the consumers of the country as food surveyors, or add more food and cheaper food to that we already have. That is what we need. Take this $18,500,000 and send it out as soon as it is appropriated, to supply the immediate necessities of those who are hungry, and you will serve a useful purpose; but to give it to men simply to demonstrate that they know something about the theories upon which wheat is produced, upon which cattle may be multiplied and made to grow larger and fatter, will not add anything to the food supply of the country.

Mr. GORDON. If I understand the gentleman, the point he makes is that the people are asking for bread and they are given a survey. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is it exactly. The gentleman from Ohio often hits the animal squarely in the eye, and he did it this time. I want something done for those who need bread and meat. This bill will not increase the wheat product of the United States 1 bushel. It will not increase the meat product of the United States 1 pound, or relieve the immediate necessities of the people or their necessities for the next year. If you will prohibit gambling in the price of food and prosecute and convict those who violate that law, you will help some. But the money appropriated in this bill will be spent, the people will have a report that nobody will read, and the food shortage will go on until the war is over and the millions now destroying life and property again become producers of products that supply the necessities and contribute to the comforts and happiness of life. [Applause.]

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new section, and ask that it be read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ASWELL: Page 4, line 19, after the word "receipt," add a new section, as follows:

"That agricultural colleges and experiment stations shall be, and are hereby, authorized and permitted (a) to investigate and to teach the science and art of producing, refining, and combining vegetable and animal oils and fats, including butter, into palatable and wholesome food forms; and (b) to investigate and to teach the uses to which such food forms are advantageously adapted; and (c) to use, in the respective dining halls and boarding houses maintained by such colleges and stations, for their own faculties, student bodies, or employees, such foods so produced by them free from any tax. In event any such institution shall in the course of such investigations and teaching produce quantities of such foods in excess of its own requirements, such excess may be placed upon the market subject to all the laws, rules, and regulations which are now, or may hereafter be, provided for the production, sale, and distribution of such food.

"That upon application to the proper authorities by any such agricultural college or experiment station through its duly authorized officer or agent a license for the manufacture of oleomargarine shall be issued to such agricultural college or experiment station without the imposition of any special tax and without the execution of any bond, but such agricultural college or experiment station so licensed shall, through its duly authorized officer or agent, comply in all other respects with the laws, rules, and regulations governing the manufacture, sale, and distribution of oleomargarine."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we have passed that section.

Mr. ASWELL. It is offered to come in following section 5.

Mr. LEVER and Mr. HAUGEN reserved points of order.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment merely offers an opportunity to the agricultural institution to increase the food supply without any cost to the Government. It will enable them to carry on experiments in various animal and vegetable oils and thereby increase the food product vastly in the country, with no cost to anyone, either individually or to the Government. It seems to me that if there ever was a time when such a measure should be considered favorably it is now.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ASWELL. Upon what ground does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. On the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. LEVER. I reserve the point of order on the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the speeches in the main this morning have been on the question before the House, and I hope to see that continue until this debate is closed. My good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] rarely makes a speech that he does not inject partisan politics into it or bitterly criticize the administration, the power that is to conduct this war against Germany. Sometimes he makes a bold and straightforward attack on the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and then again he makes a flank attack, as he did on yesterday. I do not know why he does that. I take it that his constituents are loyal and will be. There are many German people in Philadelphia of the old stock; they have been here many years, and they are going to be as loyal in this war as anybody else in the country, and they are more loyal now, to my way of thinking, than some gentlemen on this floor who can not refrain from attacking the administration in one way or another.

Gentlemen, let us quit that. Let us differ as we may on matters of legislation, but let us say nothing here that will encourage the German spies, the anarchist, and the bomb thrower anywhere. The press of to-day tells us that the Kaiser, out of pity for us, is holding back his agents and spies because he would like to have our good offices at the end of the war; that he does not want to punish us except on the high seas and on the battle field.

Let us stand as one man, so that the world will know that there is now no divided opinion in the Congress of the United States as regards the war with Germany. Let nobody at this critical time try to play politics.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] never would have offered to tax cotton if it had been produced in Pennsylvania. They grow a lot of wool in Pennsylvania, but he does not offer to tax wool; he does not offer to tax flax; he does not offer to tax silk. Why did he undertake to tax cotton? Gentlemen, we will not produce more than enough cotton to supply our munition plants and the cotton factories of the United States. The boll weevil is sweeping the cotton belt of the South, and the Government will need a great deal of cotton to make gunpowder and explosive shells. Cotton is the greatest explosive power in the world, and yet you want to lay an additional tax on it and on the Government itself, for when you strike cotton you strike the most powerful defensive power that we have in this war. Quit doing and saying things here that excite sectional feeling and prejudice. God knows we have had enough of that. We are far enough removed from the War between the States to speak as Americans from every quarter of our country. [Applause.] I want to see that time come quickly. I want my friend from Pennsylvania to reach the time when he can get up here and discuss a question so that no man who listens to him will think that he is deep down in his heart trying to handicap the administration in its prosecution of the war. Let him give the reason for objecting to positions taken by this side or that side, but let no man put a statement in the RECORD or a newspaper that is unfriendly to our purposes that a spy can take up anywhere and say, "Here is what a Member of Congress said." Gentlemen, the time has passed for differences of that character. Let us all be loyal Americans now.

This matter of conserving the food of the country is necessary. We want to know what the food supply of the country is, and when you go to the farmer and find out how much foodstuff he has, and you take his name, you are rendering him the greatest service possible, because he wants to know where the markets are, and this gives to the farmer the information that he wants.

You take his name, and you know where to go to get wheat and to get corn and meat, and every farmer in the country will welcome that service. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it gets rather wearisome to have the gentleman from Alabama constantly lecturing the House on patriotism and giving information to the German spies, which information is not correct, that there are a lot of men in the great American Congress who are not patriotic, but are uttering treasonable statements. If there is anything of that kind said, it is the language the gentleman from Alabama has used frequently in the House on that subject. I would advise him to follow the example he urges others to follow. No one on this side of the House needs the lecture of the gentleman from Alabama on patriotism, and no spy will get any comfort from what has been said on this floor, except from what the gentleman from Alabama himself has said.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield? Can the gentleman point to any statement of mine that will give comfort to a German spy?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; the gentleman said that Members on the floor of this House were not patriotic in the speeches they made; that they were uttering almost, if not quite, treasonable utterances. If that does not give comfort to a German spy I do not know what would.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said that the statement of the gentleman did not sound patriotic.

Mr. MANN. There is no one in this House who is not patriotic.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the gentleman agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] when he said that the allies had made a glove for us to fight with, and that we were fighting their battles?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am not under cross-examination by the gentleman from Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment is to strike out certain language relating to private agencies or persons. I believe that we will have to revolutionize all of our ideas about government and government control before this war is over, and that the sooner we do it the better we will be off. Gentlemen fear a food dictatorship. The first thing we ought to think of now is the increased production of foods and other articles which we need. The thing of primary importance is to increase production. Having increased production, the next in primary importance is to conserve the supply by allowing no waste; first, by allowing no waste in the fields where it is produced, and, second, by preventing waste by those who consume. If I understand this bill, which has been talked about as a food-survey bill, referred to even by the chairman of the Agricultural Committee as a food-survey bill, its primary and main purpose is to increase production, partly by furnishing seeds, if that be necessary, in places, and by attacking the enemies of growing crops. That is the real purpose of the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I have not the time. I do not interrupt other gentlemen when they are making statements; to do so, is to consume time unnecessarily. That is what makes the House waste so much time. A man on the floor has a thought in his mind, and is interrupted, and seldom or never gets back to it. The purpose of this bill is to have the Government do everything it can to induce people to produce more and to aid them while they are producing. Who is opposed to that? You may say that the farmers will do just as well without advice or help. Let me give you one little illustration, if I have the time. You have read a lot about how the Boy Scouts are going to cultivate the fields down in Potomac Park. I go down there nearly every day, sometimes twice a day, for a ride, to get some fresh air. They have plowed up a great field there. I think they are planting corn there now, and it may be a good crop; but some time ago the Boy Scouts went down there one Saturday and planted; they planted some onion sets and some radish seeds. The onion sets were planted in rows about 14 inches apart when they ought not to have been more than 3 or 4 inches apart. The radish seeds were planted in rows about 3 feet apart when they ought to have been planted in rows not more than 12 or 14 inches apart, and were planted about 50 seeds to an inch. They need some aid from men who can give advice.

Mr. HAUGEN. All of it is under the supervision of these supervisors.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I have been so much interested in the lectures given by gentlemen on agriculture that I had almost forgotten that I had asked for time. I want to make just a few observations. If this Nation is conspicuously great for anything, it is for its agricultural production. We are, indeed, a great agricultural country. Without the products of the farm and the field this Nation would not to-day occupy its exalted position among the nations of earth. The fact is apparent to everyone that old conditions are rapidly changing and new conditions are confronting us. Conditions in the great productive section of the West and the Middle West, the great agricultural States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, Nebraska, and other States—that region of our common country from which the granaries of earth have been filled in the past and must be kept filled in the future—are changing. Old theories of production have been applied so long that the fertility of the soil is being wasted; it has become and is now of paramount importance that new theories be applied to the farm.

I want to say to you that in my judgment there is no department of government rendering to the hundred millions of people of this Republic such service, service of such inestimable value, as the Agricultural Department. All over this land wherever patriotic men are contemplating a response to the call to duty, the appeal to produce foodstuffs to supply the citizens and armies of this country and of our allies, men are appealing to the Agricultural Department for assistance, not necessarily for money, but for instruction and direction. They want the expert knowledge that has been gained through a long series of years by the Agricultural Department to be disseminated so it may be of use to the farmer. I know of sections where the people out of private funds have engaged gentlemen skilled in agricultural pursuits and accomplishments for the purpose of securing expert instruction for the farmers of the particular districts. Permit me to say, not by way of boasting, but as a mere recitation of a fact which is pertinent and may be of interest, the people of the agricultural county in which I reside have recently engaged a man of large experience, who was for many years connected with the Agricultural College of Missouri, at a salary of $5,000, contributed out of their private purses, to help the farmers produce this year the kind of crop they ought to produce from the fertile lands of the county.

I hope every amendment which seeks to disparage this bill or seeks to weaken the arm of the Government administered through the Agricultural Department will fail. I want to see this Congress stand by those in authority, when it comes to the question of producing and conserving food products for ourselves, our armies, and our allies. We have voted millions and billions of dollars for other purposes, and I say to you that there ought now to be voted ample money to enable the Agricultural Department to carry on all of its great activities, with the hope that the utmost good may follow to those patriotic citizens who will produce food supplies for the world.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the amendment before the committee proposes to strike out the words "private agencies or persons."

I believe that the work contemplated to be done under authority of this legislation should be in the charge of Government officials and Government agents. I do not believe that it is necessary for the Department of Agriculture to cooperate with private persons or with private agencies in carrying on this food survey. We have heard a great deal of criticism of the proposed food survey. I am confident that under proper supervision and under proper restrictions this food survey can be made of great value to the country, and it can be so conducted that there will be very little waste of the Government funds. But it is equally true that it can be so conducted that it will include a horde of useless and worthless employees, and the survey will amount to little or no good to anybody but to these employees to whom it will afford easy jobs.

There are men in the Department of Agriculture and in the different agricultural schools of this country and there are men engaged in scientific agricultural work who have done immeasurable good to the agricultural development of this country. There can be during this year a great deal done by such men to increase the production in the year 1918. I have found from my experience that one of the great faults with the Agricultural Department here is that it does not get its work done in time to be effective. Now, in the distribution of seeds as proposed here, if the same methods are employed during the coming year as I have observed to have been employed in the past, I would not at all be surprised to find the department sending out seeds to be planted in Nebraska, Kansas, and Montana for the season of 1918 in July, 1918.

I have a letter here that I received a few days ago from Prof. H. L. Bolley, of the North Dakota Agricultural College. Prof. Bolley during the past 30 years, and I say this advisedly, has done more to increase the production of flax, wheat, and oats than any other man in the United States. Many of the best students of the science of agronomy credit him with having done more to increase the production of wheat and flax during the past 30 years than any other man in the world. Besides being a distinguished scientist he is also a most practical man. He writes a letter here which I have and which I shall insert in the RECORD to Mr. Galloway, of the Department of Agriculture. He says in that letter that nothing can be done now to increase the production for this year except to apply the best and least wasteful methods of harvesting of the crops that have already been sown. But he says that now is the time to start work for next year to increase the acreage and the bushelage. He proposes that an investigation be made now to determine the sections of the country where wheat and other grains can be produced to the best advantage next year.

He has been for 30 years a student of the diseases of flax, wheat, oats, and barley.

NORTH DAKOTA AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE,
Agricultural College, N. Dak., May 15, 1917.

Hon. PATRICK D. NORTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose a copy of a letter which I am sending to Hon. B. T. Galloway, in charge of the food conservation service of the Department of Agriculture. On account of your acquaintance with my work, this letter will probably be self-explanatory. I believe that the proper solution of this more intensive wheat cropping—the getting of more bushels of wheat from the same or less number of acres—has much to do with the future prosperity of the entire Northwest. The sooner this question of deteriorated grain due to constant cropping is faced and overcome the sooner will come the economic results and the proper development of the agriculture of this region.

I am sure I may bespeak your interest and cooperation in this matter and any aid that you may give looking toward getting something definitely done toward assuring a more satisfactory wheat crop, not only for next year but for time to come, for I believe that now when the world is demanding a greater bushelage is the time to get the proper methods introduced for insuring this bushelage and for improving the crop.

Yours, respectfully,

H. L. BOLLEY.

FARGO, N. DAK., May 14, 1917.

Hon. B. T. GALLOWAY,
Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have written the Secretary of Agriculture offering my services for any duty connected with agriculture or the conservation and expansion of our food supply.

I write you more fully, because well known to you. You have known of my potato work, flax work, and, in part, as to my wheat studies. Chiefly, it is with reference to wheat that I feel that I may, perhaps, be of greatest service. If the Nation is to soon increase the wheat output, a real change of method with reference to handling the crop for the control of cereal diseases must be put on.

This crop has had only general agricultural methods applied. It is time that intensive methods be started. Since the propaganda for the prevention of stinking smut was started there has been no proper consideration or consecutive campaign looking toward improving the agriculture of the crop in its relation to seed and soil-borne diseases. To fight these there must be put on a persistent and consistent campaign for (1) right harvesting, to prevent invasion of seed coats; (2) right grading, to eliminate as far as possible the lightweight, disease-infected seed; and (3) right treatment to destroy external infection and, as far as possible, internal infection which has not been removed by selection, all to be closely coordinated in each district according to cropping conditions, with proper land handling as to previous crops on the land, drainage, tillage, seeding processes, etc.

When you were first starting your work in Washington in the fall of 1890 you wrote asking me to accept a special assistantship in plant pathology for three months, at $100 per month. That was when I was just getting interested in the pathology of potatoes and of the great wheat crop of the Northwest. I wanted to accept, but did not. For over 25 years I have literally lived with this wheat crop and the other crops which are associated with it. I have daily either worked in the field and in field plots or with the seed and with the farmers to get them to apply the methods advised. That I have succeeded with the potato-scab propaganda and the flax-wilt propaganda because of the results with our resistant flax, is no longer in doubt. The last two years has seen an average increased bushelage per acre in North Dakota largely because of the results from our work, and I am sure now that the farmers of the Northwest when called upon for this flax crop, can produce it, for our tabulated data begins to show even greater yields on old flax-sick soils than were ever raised upon virgin lands. You are aware also of the success of my campaign for the use of formaldehyde against wheat and oat smut.

I hope you will understand my enthusiasm and that you will not discount it when I tell you that I would like to be of special service to mankind at this time when it appears that in the next few years sufficient wheat to properly feed the people can scarcely be produced unless they be exceptionally favorable years. I would like to aid you of the United States Department of Agriculture, if the time can be adjusted with our authorities here, and I think it can, to put on a real campaign for a real wheat crop for the season of 1918, and particularly for 1919, when this country, and perhaps the world, is sure to need the wheat as it never has before. You will pardon me for appearing skeptical, but except only in dry years can the great Red River Valley wheat regions of the North produce a big bushelage or on favorable years; and this is but the story of the constantly cropped areas everywhere, particularly California and the Northwest. I think you will agree with me that the wheat bushelage can not be greatly increased by just sowing more bushelage on the same old areas in the same old way. What has plant pathology done for the grape industry, for the citrus-fruit industry, for the apple crop of the apple regions, etc.? Let's do it for the wheat crop of 1918 and 1919.

Much can be done to better save and conserve the wheat now growing. Nothing can be done to increase the total bushelage except by better thrashing and storage. Much must be done if the Nation wishes to escape the ravages of the root and seed destroying parasites of wheat, such as scab and the various fusaria and holminthosporio attacks. These are far greater than you or anyone not familiar with the constantly cropped wheat areas can contemplate. You will understand when I tell you that it is practically impossible on the newest lands of Montana and Alberta to find a sample of wheat with more than 50 per cent of the kernels free from internal infection with holminthosporium, fusarium, or alternaria. It is these which in constant cultivation prevent the stooling and prevent the filling, even though the rust years are not on. When rust is reasonably bad the straw becomes a rag because of these internal tissue-destroying semisaprophytes. As soon as the roots come in contact with the old stubble they are cut off and can not reach the moisture of the subsoil, and when the hot winds come the shriveling occurs, whether fertility and water are available or not.

These last-named disease producers—the so-called "imperfects"—did far more harm on the old wheat lands last year than the rust. Had there been rust only, we would still have had wheat in abundance.

I truly wish to be of service at this time, and feel that I can put before you a plan which will mean a real revolution in the agriculture of wheat which shall be of immediate effect and of lasting character, for the demonstration only needs to be made to our farming public. They now understand things when they see, though some of our supposed highest-trained agriculturists, and even the chemists, do not go into the field often enough to understand.

If you wish, I will gladly come to Washington to confer with you and others, as you may choose. The general thought is, in short, (1) how to arrange for high-quality seed for 1918 crops, and (2) how to get the acreage for 1918 not only safely increased but largely put on to essentially new (virgin) lands, or upon lands which have previously had the right list of crops or the right tillage to insure reasonable freedom from the wheat diseases. It is the seed and soil sanitation problem put into operation for wheat. It needs governmental and State aid in a broad way, properly supervised and coordinated. There are, of course, many side phases to the problem. I name only a few of the areas which would be affected. North Dakota has over half its land virgin, untouched by the plow; Montana a larger percentage, and no doubt many Western States and Eastern States have similar areas. You may not believe it, but we do not so much need fertile lands as we need disease-free lands; at least this is so in the wheat belt. Remember the California problem. Why have they ceased wheat? There are immense areas in the semidry regions of Washington, Oregon, and California, but the universal thrasher soon so filled the ground with the smut spores that the formaldehyde treatment is not effective. It did more, it filled these soils full of these other imperfects. These States have countless acres of semiarid land which can be put under proper tillage when they are located, but to have them ready for next year means immediate work in the way of plowing. There is also the great wheat belt of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota, where the farmers will still continue to work the old plowed areas if it is not in some way interrupted sufficiently to attract their attention. These are valuable lands for other crops. Let us get them to give the wheat crop a chance. It will not do to take the old seed from the old cropped areas for use on the new or clean lands.

Finally, pardon me for this lengthy suggestion, but understand that I am at your service and, I believe, can so arrange my investigation and seed-commissioner work here that I could give time to aid you in any special food problem which you may assign, though, of course, I am nowhere so well known as here in the Northwest.

If the work of which I speak is to be done so as to be effective on the 1918 crop it must start very soon, before harvest, 1917, and continue so as to arrange for proper seed quality and to have time to put on a proper general soil survey, accompanied by an intelligent campaign and propaganda to carry out the work. The areas of chief diseases of the wheat crop, so far as soil and seed diseases are concerned, should be located and those lands be utilized for other crops just as vital perhaps as wheat. Lands which are either new or which have been under proper tillage, so as to be nearly free from the troubles, should be located and, so far as the spring-wheat areas are concerned, early plowed, so that the seed could go into the ground early the coming spring.

Yours, respectfully, H. L. BOLLEY.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, may I have a few minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been limited. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is recognized.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a preliminary step, as I understand it, to one that is to follow. It provides for what is called a survey, the value of which was testified to by our friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] in his closing remarks. He says it will be, in effect, an establishment of a bureau of markets for farmers and that after this survey has been taken any buyer of wheat will know to what farmer he can go and buy the produce of his farm. With all due respect to my friend from Alabama, having had 20 years or more of experience in business, having observed the movement of crops from the field to the consuming market, factory, mill, or whatever it may be, I am sure that is not true. The farmers do not raise crops to hold. But in that connection I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the market price of wheat to-day is the finest stimulant to greater production that can be had.

Mr. BURNETT. May I ask my colleague if we have not already a Bureau of Markets?

Mr. SLAYDEN. We have a Bureau of Markets, a Bureau of Statistics, and everything else that can be suggested.

There is real distress in some sections of the country, and as was so clearly and sensibly pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], it is not the distress of city population and manufacturing centers only. The distress of high prices bears also upon the farmer. And it does sometimes seem to be true that this is a conspiracy on the part of—I adopt Mr. CANNON'S figures—two-thirds of the people to depress the prices received by one-third of the people. The price of farm commodities will certainly go down and without legislation because the price they are bringing to-day, for wheat and cotton and oats and corn and other productions of that sort, has stimulated the cultivation, and there will be an excessive production of all food crops this year, so far as it may be done, and certainly next year, if prices continue at a profitable level.

We do not need anything more than the old and, fortunately, unrepealed law of supply and demand.

I do not believe that the survey will be of any value. I think the only thing to be accomplished by this bill will be the expenditure of a great deal of money at a time, of all times, when we should exercise economy. It may be the gentlemen have had their minds attuned to the expenditure of billions to that degree that the waste of ten, fifteen, twenty, or thirty million dollars appears to them a trifling matter. But I remember the time in this Congress when if a man had proposed such an expenditure as this to make a special census under such circumstances, he would have been laughed out of court. Farm produce is never held, and a survey taken on Monday is comparatively worthless on the following Saturday, because 100,000,000 people have been consuming and shipping out their production, and in 30 days after it was reported it would be absolutely without any relation to the facts.

I want to mention one or two little experiences from my own district, which have come under my observation and which have a direct bearing on this food-supply question. I had a letter a few days ago from a constituent and a farmer who is doing his best to increase the food supply, more than his best at this time, because the prices are very favorable. He told me that he had 200 acres of wheat. He produces in an ordinary year from 20 to 30 bushels of wheat to the acre. He says the drought and adverse weather conditions have destroyed the crop so completely that he would not find it worth his time to cut it, and he had decided to put the land in corn. I had a letter from another friend down there, a former Member of this House, who told me he had 350 acres of wheat, and that there was so little prospect of getting back the money that it would cost to harvest it that he had decided to plow it up and put the land in cotton.

Now, gentlemen, those things are what account for the high prices of wheat. And the high price of wheat will explain the tremendously increased effort on the part of people to increase production.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will not those facts have a tendency to increase the price of wheat?

Mr. SLAYDEN. You mean the scarcity? I do not quite understand the question of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I say these facts that the gentleman narrates will increase the price.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes. There is hardly a merchant engaged in his city that does not know it perfectly well.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be a good thing to let every farmer in the spring-wheat-growing region know it, so that they will raise wheat in the expectation of a high price for it?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MANN. That is what this will do.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not see Mr. MOORE present. I suggest that the gentleman from South Carolina use some time.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would not take the time of the committee at this moment except to reenforce what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] so well said a moment ago. There has arisen confusion as to what this bill means from the fact that it has been referred to as a food-survey bill, as distinguished from the other bill which we intend to bring in later, which is to be known as the food-control bill. But this bill is limited in no sense of the word to a food survey. A food survey, in my judgment, is just about one-third of the importance of this bill; probably not that much.

I think a survey of the food situation in this country, to know just "where we are at" on food supplies, is absolutely necessary; but this bill goes very much further than that. This bill undertakes not only to have a complete food survey of this country made, but also to stimulate food production, and at the same time to stimulate food conservation in this country.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. No. The gentleman from Indiana would not let me interrupt him when he was speaking.

Mr. PURNELL. How long does the gentleman think, in his judgment, it would take to make a survey?

Mr. LEVER. I will be glad to answer that. Many misstatements have been made on the floor of this House, both as to the amount of the appropriation contained in this bill, the number of employees, and the time it will take to make this food survey. The Secretary of Agriculture in a letter addressed to me under date of May 22 says:

> I think we can get a fairly accurate view of the situation within a few weeks, or within not more than 30 days.

Mr. BURNETT. Then, will the term of office of these canvassers stop?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. The bill does not say so.

Mr. LEVER. You are not going to have employees that are not working, and nobody dreams of that kind of situation.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. No; I can not yield. The testimony comes before the committee that in European nations this food survey was made in anywhere from 20 to 30 days, and they admit that they did not have the machinery for doing this work that we have in this country. Every man who testified before the committee paid the highest tribute to the machinery of the Department of Agriculture for getting information.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. LEVER. If I yield to the gentleman, I will have to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LEVER. Well, yes.

Mr. PURNELL. I want to ask what the gentleman thinks of the proposition advocated on the floor, that this survey might be taken by the county agents and the agricultural institutions of the country, and perhaps, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX], through the assistance of the rural carriers?

Mr. LEVER. I am much obliged to the gentleman for that question. It is a pertinent and sensible question. The Secretary of Agriculture desires to use every agency at the command of the Department of Agriculture; the county agent, the statistical agent, the crop reporter, the township agent; the meat inspection force, wherever it can be used to advantage; the inspectors employed in the administration of the food and drugs act, wherever they can be used to advantage, and the gin reporters; and I take it that the rural carriers themselves, if it is thought wise, may be called upon to furnish information if they have any on this subject. We are going to work this thing out in a sensible way, and I am trying to defeat the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because we want the broadest cooperation on the part of everybody.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I said I yielded my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], but he is not here, so I will use the time myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEVER. I wanted to close the debate. I hardly think that is a fair thing to do.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have had five minutes reserved.

Mr. LEVER. All right; go ahead.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee has stated that there have been numerous misstatements made on this floor. He states that the Secretary now hands him a letter asserting that this survey can be made within 30 days. I call the gentleman's attention to the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who admits now, as did Mr. Brand, that it is his purpose to visit every granary, and that the farmer will welcome these Government agents. We have in this country more than 10,000,000 granaries.

Mr. Brand says we must have a certified statement from every one of them. They are to go to these granaries; they are to measure the bins. They will not trust other agents to do this work because they are not "experts" along that line. We called the attention of Mr. Brand to the fact that this work could be done in the Census Bureau. He told the committee it was necessary to be done by his "experts." Oh, no; the average man can not be trusted with making a food survey!

Another gentleman has stated that it is necessary to increase and stimulate food production in the United States. The gentleman from Illinois believes that this very appropriation is going to increase the price of food products. Why, we have appropriated $200,000,000 in the last 10 years, all under the pretense that we would increase the food production of the United States. Two hundred millions has been appropriated. Instead of food production increasing, food production has been decreased. It has gone up and it has gone down, and now as a whole it is practically where we started. But when the department was confronted with the fact that the yield had not increased another propaganda was started and pushed with great vigor. And what was it? Oh, they told us first that the yield had increased to such an extent that figures were scarcely adequate to describe the increase. Later they come in and say the trouble is not with the increase of the yield. They say, "We have talked as eloquently as possible; we have failed in our efforts. What is necessary to do now is not for the farmer to increase the yield, but he must produce less; he must grow fewer apples."

The gentleman has referred to Europe. The United States has 3,000,000 square miles. Some of the European countries have less than 200 square miles. Some of the countries referred to are only twice as large as the congressional district which I have the honor to represent. Many of these European countries referred to are only twice as large as the State of Iowa. Yet here we would apply the same plan to Iowa or to the United States. The population in the United States is less than 30 people to the mile. In some of the European countries it is 500 to the mile. How can you compare conditions in a country which has only 200,000 square miles with the United States, which has 3,000,000 square miles? The population per square mile was as follows in 1902:

	Number of square miles.	Population.	Population per square mile.
German Empire	208,850	58,549,000	280
Italy	110,646	32,475,000	293
France	207,054	38,962,000	188
United Kingdom	121,371	41,961,000	345
Belgium	11,373	6,694,000	588
United States	3,025,600	80,372,000	26.56

The United States is more than six times, or nearly seven times, as large as Italy, France, Belgium, and the United Kingdom combined.

Italy is only twice as large as Iowa, with 55,475 square miles.

Belgium is about twice as large as my district, with 5,624 square miles.

The United States has 6,361,622 farms. Each farm has a granary, and many of them have two. Besides these we have thousands of elevators, cold-storage houses, and various other places containing food products; also the kitchens and cellars. If we are to have a food survey and know the exact amount of food on hand, I take it if enough experts can be employed to carry out such a plan the survey will be extended to the kitchens and cellars as well as to the larger storehouses. I take it that it is just as important to have information as to the number of eggs on hand as it is to know the number of bushels of cereals.

Now a word as to the increase in yield. First, as to the number of blades of grass that have been increased.

Hay dropped from 1.50 short tons per acre in 1908 to 1.31 short tons in 1913. The yield of oats from 1866 to 1875 was 28.01 bushels, and dropped to 27.02 bushels in 1897.

Rye from 1866 to 1875 yielded 13.06 bushels, and in 1914 it went up to 16.08 bushels. Barley from 1866 to 1875 averaged 22.09 bushels, and dropped down to 20.04 in 1900, but went up to 25.08 in 1914.

Potatoes, exclusive of sweet potatoes, yielded 95.4 in 1907 and only 90.04 in 1913.

The Statistical Abstract of the United States Census for 1915, on page 123, gives the production of wheat and corn as follows:

Production of wheat.

	Bushels.	Average number of bushels per acre.
1911	621,338,000	12.5
1912	730,267,000	15.9
1913	763,380,000	15.2
1914	891,017,000	16.6
1915	1,011,505,000	16.9

Production of corn.

	Bushels.	Average number of bushels per acre.
1911	2,531,488,000	23.9
1912	3,124,746,000	29.2
1913	2,446,988,000	23.1
1914	2,672,804,000	25.8
1915	3,054,535,000	28.2

Recent reports estimate the crop of wheat for 1916 at 639,886,000 bushels.

The corn crop for 1916 is estimated at 2,582,000,000 bushels.

So we have increased the yield by the action of this department. As stated by the gentleman from Illinois, there was some planting done right here in the District of Columbia, and he told about where they planted 40 seeds where only 3 should be planted and 3 where more should have been planted. Gentlemen, that was under conditions similar to those proposed in this bill. [Laughter.]

Considering the present condition of our Treasury and the urgent need for money all along the line, the difficulty that we have in disposing of our bonds, with $7,000,000,000 of bonds and Treasury certificates already authorized, with more than $5,000,000,000 already appropriated, can we in view of the results attained, and under existing conditions, afford to make the appropriation called for in this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint two additional Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, who shall perform such duties as may be required by law or prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and who shall each be paid a salary of $5,000 per annum.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DOWELL offers the following amendment: Page 5, strike out all of section 6.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have an amendment that I wish to offer.

Mr. LEVER. In 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be concluded in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, just why two additional secretaries are needed in this department has not been made clear. This section provides for an additional expense of $10,000 for this department, and, to my mind, this is unnecessary. The Secretary of Agriculture now has one assistant. Whatever is to be done in the department under this bill evidently has been arranged or is being arranged by the head of the department. The carrying out of this plan no doubt will be done under his direction, and I assume it will be unnecessary to employ more secretaries to draw more salaries.

I have been somewhat interested in the discussion relating to the purposes of this bill, but I do not intend to go into this question.

I concede that there are many things that may be done to assist the farmers of the country; but as I understand it, in this bill you are providing for a lot of employees who may know but little about the subject to assist the farmers in raising agricultural products. In my opinion, if the farmers are given an opportunity, without too much restriction and legislation, they will properly raise the products of the country.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Does not the gentleman have some requests for representatives of the department to appear before farmers' gatherings in his districts? I know I have.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; and we have an agricultural college at Ames, Iowa, in the district which I have the honor to represent, which is the best in the world, and we have there the best experts in the country on the various subjects of agriculture.

Mr. YOUNG of North Daktoa. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. DOWELL. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Ever since I have been down here there has been quite a demand from the people in my State for representatives of the department in Washington to appear at various farmers' gatherings.

Mr. DOWELL. But there is no demand that I have heard of for putting two additional secretaries in the Agricultural Department at $5,000 a year, the principal duties being, I fear, to draw the salaries.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is the gentleman that the gentleman from Iowa refers to, Dr. R. A. Pearson, president of the Iowa State College?

Mr. DOWELL. No, sir.

Mr. KING. Is Dr. Pearson an authority in your State?

Mr. DOWELL. He ought to be; he is president of the State Agricultural College in Iowa, and, as I said, one of the best in the world.

Mr. KING. Did he not testify as follows: "Doctor, if you will permit, is not that one of three important things to be done—this food survey proposition;" and did not Dr. Pearson say, "By all means"?

Mr. DOWELL. I am not discussing that part of it, and that has nothing to do with this section. My objection is to unnecessarily providing for numerous employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York wants to offer an amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have this amendment disposed of before taking up my amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, as a member of this committee I have felt that some things reported in the bill were not defensible, but I have yielded my convictions in this emergency to certain items of appropriation. I would rather spend a little money, even if spent foolishly, than to take the risk of leaving undone some things that ought to be done in this great emergency that confronts us.

What I want to refer to is the Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture. When the bill was first reported these two positions were permanent positions. I raised the question in the committee and I raise it here and now that when emergency legislation is offered in this House—the emergency being this war—that whether it be the Agricultural Department or any other department of this Government, they ought not to take advantage of the emergency legislation to fasten on this country these expensive official positions that they are seeking in the various departments. [Applause.] So this bill—when I raised that objection the committee that reports this bill limited these official positions to the emergency that actually exists, and when this emergency ceases these two positions cease. That is the point I am making. I think every department of this Government and this Congress ought to say that when these departments come before Congress seeking to fasten on the taxpayer these expensive new positions that we ought to read every bill carefully and provide for the emergency and not let them put over on Congress positions that are permanent but make them emergency positions.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the two Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture as a permanent thing, and for this reason: In North Dakota, where we produce the greatest amount of wheat, where we produce the greatest amount of flax of any State in the Union, the great agricultural State of the Nation, we have been waiting for about 25 years to get the Secretary of Agriculture out there, and he has not been there yet. In 25 years we have had one Assistant Secretary there. Now, we have frequent calls at large gatherings of farmers for representatives of the department. They do not want underlings or subordinates, $1,800 men, as the gentleman from Iowa says; they want the Secretary or an Assistant Secretary. There is really a demand for this class of men as representatives of the department. I want to say also that the Department of Agriculture ought to be of equal dignity with the other departments, and the other departments have more than one Assistant Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, may I also call attention to an important conference of grain growers from the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, North Dakota, and South Dakota, held at Fargo this week. It was called for the purpose of considering the legislation proposed in House bill 4630. Little has been heard from the farmers of the country upon this subject. I am sure the committee will be glad to consider the resolutions adopted by the conference, as follows:

Your committee begs leave to report as follows:

"That the conference called at Fargo May 23, 1917, for the purpose of discussing governmental control of food prices, hereby goes on record for the following principles:

"1. We believe that the present war emergency and the world-wide shortage necessitate that our Federal Government shall take upon itself larger powers, in order to encourage greater food production and to control the sale and distribution of food products. We believe that such action would be in the interest of producers and consumers.

"2. We favor a rigid governmental guaranty to the farmers of profitable prices for staple farm products. Such guaranties are necessary for farmers to know how to reorganize their farming operations and to secure an increased production. Such reorganization incurs extra outlays of capital and extra expenses for labor and other essential factors. In the event that the Government should see fit to fix the prices of food products that farmers shall obtain, we also favor a rigid governmental control of the prices of other commodities than food, such as fuel, clothing, and agricultural requirements necessary or incident to the manufacturing and the mobilization of farm products. We believe that the principal factor in determining the prices of farm products to farmers should be the average cost of producing such products.

"3. We earnestly suggest that in line with the course of other warring nations the Government shall immediately prepare itself to seize and operate, whenever and wherever necessary, all transportation agencies and terminal elevators and warehouses.

"4. We hereby empower the committee which has been designated to represent us at Washington to systematize and present all necessary data and to ascertain the wishes of this conference and of other grain-growing interests as to what is considered by the farmers to be a fair price guaranty on the standard grades of grain.

"5. This conference also takes the opportunity to express its loyalty to the President and the Government of the United States, and to state the desire of farmers' organizations of the Northwest represented here to cooperate in the working out of this most important policy of food-production control.

"6. Your committee, after careful consideration of such facts and data as it has available, is of the opinion that the prices guaranteed by the Government for our 1917 crop of wheat shall be $2.50 per bushel for No. 1 northern wheat, at northwestern terminals, and we believe that the delegation to be sent to Washington to represent this conference shall use every legitimate method to establish this price."

The following resolution was then proposed from the floor of the conference, and unanimously adopted:

"7. Resolved further, That future trading in farm products be prohibited not as a temporary war measure, but as a permanent governmental policy."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I want five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. The time for debate has been closed by agreement.

Mr. HAUGEN. We have a number of members of the committee who would like to be heard.

Mr. LEVER. I think the chairman of this Agricultural Committee has been exceedingly liberal as to time, and gentlemen ought not to impose on the chairman.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have not taken any unnecessary time on this bill.

Mr. LEVER. I asked the gentleman from Minnesota and he said that he did not want any time on this section.

Mr. ANDERSON. I said if the time was closed I was satisfied, but if the time is to be extended I want five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of gentlemen to the agreement that debate was to be closed in 15 minutes, but there still remains 7 minutes. The gentleman from New York had 5 but did not use it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But, Mr. Chairman, I am going to use it on my amendment. I have sent an amendment to the desk that has not been read.

Mr. LEVER. Then I ask the gentleman to consume his time, now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to say that he did not want to offer his amendment until this amendment that is now pending was disposed of.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I did so state, Mr. Chairman, but I understand that in order to speak on my amendment I will have to offer it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, section 6, after the period on line 6, add the following: "And all other appointments made in pursuance of the provisions of this act, including the appointment of inspectors, agents, experts, clerks, and employees by the Secretary of Agriculture, as authorized in this act, shall be in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883: Provided, That all male citizens appointed by virtue of this act shall not be less than 31 years of age."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this section.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order can not be made now. This amendment is not in order. It is offered for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to inquire why the amendment is not in order?

Mr. TOWNER. I say the objection is not in order because the amendment has not been offered yet.

The CHAIRMAN. It is offered.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from New York is offering the amendment merely as a matter of information, the gentleman from Iowa is right about it.

Mr. TOWNER. That is all that can be done, because there is already one amendment pending.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is not necessarily true, Mr. Chairman, because the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is to strike out, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is to perfect the section, and therefore is preferential.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to be heard on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this section provides for the appointment of two Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, and the bill provides further for the appointment of agents, clerks, employees. If we can not provide in this bill for the manner in which they shall be appointed, and limit the age, then I do not know what could be germane. These men must be selected by some one, and it certainly is germane to limit in this bill the manner of their appointment.

Mr. MEEKER. What is the age the gentleman fixes?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That they shall not be less than 31 years of age.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I think the Chair is familiar with the rule, and I do not care to be heard unless the Chair desires to hear me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to have the gentleman suggest why this is not germane.

Mr. LEVER. The Chair evidently has in mind that we are considering an appropriation bill. We are not considering a general appropriation bill in the ordinary sense of the word. There is nothing in this bill upon which this might be a limitation. The fact of fixing the age of employees, the fact of saying how the employees shall be appointed, certainly could not be germane to this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair indulge me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this is a law providing for the conduct of certain phases of work to be done in the Department of Agriculture. It provides, among other things, for employees, to accomplish the purpose of the bill. It seems to me that in providing for employees we have authority to provide at the same time the manner in which they shall be appointed and especially that they shall come within the scope of the civil-service law.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, just one observation, if the Chair will bear with me. All these provisions for the application of the civil-service rules must come up just as this does in this instance, by amendments to provisions for the appointment of officers. So it certainly seems to me that it must be clear to the Chair and to everyone that we never can make the civil-service rules applicable unless we can attach them to provisions for the appointment of officers. It is not necessary that it should apply particularly to this section. It is perfectly within the rules to make it apply to all of the sections of the bill, if it is attached to any one of them, and, in fact, that is the way the civil-service rules are usually applied. Whenever there is an arrangement made, an appropriation made, a distinct provision of existing law made by which directly or indirectly new offices are to be created, it is always pertinent and in order—it is always germane—for such a provision to declare that civil-service rules shall apply.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would call the Chair's attention to the title of the regular appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that this can be regarded as a general appropriation bill. All bills, simply because they happen to carry an item appropriating money, are not necessarily appropriation bills.

Mr. LEVER. If the Chair admits that, then this can not be germane.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, may I take a moment's time of the Chair? The very fact that this is not an appropriation bill, that this is a bill creating certain offices, providing for the employment of certain individuals, gives the House the right to provide in just what manner these employees shall be appointed.

Mr. LANGLEY. If it is not in order when you are creating offices, when is it in order?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is the only time when the Congress will ever have an opportunity to say how these men shall be employed. When the next regular Agriculture appropriation bill comes up for consideration it would not be in order to provide that these men should be employed under the civil service.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But to-day, when Congress is making the law to provide for these positions, we have a perfect right to say in what manner they shall be appointed.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Do not these rules apply only to general appropriation bills?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. And is not that the language of the rule itself?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the language of the rule.

Mr. TOWNER. And this could not be considered as a general appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am placing it upon the fundamental principle that this is the law that creates these positions. It is the last chance that Congress will have to say how these employees shall be employed. This is our day to say to the Department of Agriculture how these men shall be appointed. We provide for them, we create the positions, and we have a perfect right to say under the rules of the House in what manner they shall be employed.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Kansas, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the language of the section and what is proposed to be done in the section. It reads:

That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint two additional Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, who shall perform such duties as may be required by law or prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and who shall each be paid a salary of $5,000 per annum.

Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] undertakes to say that all employees that may be employed under the terms of this bill shall be employed in a certain way, and I believe that he even fixes the age at which they may come into the service, which in itself is against the civil-service regulations and the law; and it seems to me that a section which provides for the appointment of two Assistant Secretaries, fixing their salaries and fixing their method of appointment, can not be amended in any germane manner by a proposition that undertakes to fix the method of how other employees may be chosen.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HELM. The employees of the different departments are under the classified service. This is an office. Does the gentleman know of any offices created by Congress to which officers are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate that are in any way affected by the classified service?

Mr. LEVER. That is what I am arguing. An amendment which proposes to classify other employees would not be germane at this point.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that the present civil-service law, passed as early as the eighties, applies as to appointive clerkships, and that if you desire to pass a bill exempting such from examinations you must specifically state it in the bill? Therefore, it seems to me it is out of order, because it is already covered by existing law.

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will admit that to be the purpose of the bill, I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is offered to section 6, which section provides:

That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint two additional Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, who shall perform such duties as may be required by law or prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and who shall each be paid a salary of $5,000 per annum.

Of course this amendment could not possibly apply to that section or limit the President's authority to nominate or the Senate's right of confirmation or refusal to confirm men whom the President may nominate. No other section of the bill that the Chair knows of provides for the appointment of any employees other than those perhaps he may have now in the employ of the department. The Chair does not think that the amendment is germane, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 54, noes 24.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All time on this amendment has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I still have five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think there was no agreement as to time on the paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. I think there are eight minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. There are eight minutes remaining. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I understood that five minutes of that time belonged to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, is the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] on the list?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this selective conscription?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] does not care to use his five minutes, the Chair may recognize somebody else.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] want to use his five minutes of time?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the Chairman that the time be extended 10 minutes. We will make time by it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a full five minutes. The time is running now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am glad my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has returned to the Hall, because it is in my mind to make some response to him before I take my seat.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I have just returned from lunch.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman feels better. I realize the magnitude of the task imposed on me in attempting to reply to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], more especially as I am but an humble Member of this House and he is the eloquent spokesman of the administration. The gentleman from Alabama, who may be regarded by those he criticizes as a foeman worthy of their steel, was in excellent form this morning. Cotton advanced yesterday to 21 cents a pound on the heels of the tax bill of $1,800,000,000 last week, in which we permitted cotton to go free of taxes.

Now, the gentleman from Alabama is not only the spokesman of the administration in matters political, secret and public, but he is also the special representative upon this floor of the great cotton monopoly, which, of course, is confined to certain States, which I may not mention here for fear of becoming sectional. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Alabama knows that by reason of the war in Europe and the particular preference given to cotton during that war, at least $1,500,000,000 worth of wealth went to cotton producers last year on which they paid no excise taxes. Hence the enthusiasm of the gentleman from Alabama this morning. He knew that everything that is produced from cotton that is fabricated from cotton pays taxes, and pays them heavily, in the bill recently passed, but that cotton itself is exempt.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not time in five minutes; but to my gracious friend I will, even though it robs me of that which I have not. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman must admit that even the whole cotton belt is not deriving any profit like that enjoyed by the Steel Trust.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, the gentleman from Alabama knows more about the Steel Trust than I do; but I will say to him that the Steel Trust is on particularly intimate terms with the present administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] But it may be unpatriotic to mention these things now, because we are at war with Germany and, in the language of the gentleman, we might reveal something to some German spy, if we should dare to speak of so pertinent a matter.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman has made the statement. Will he explain how and why and in what way the Steel Trust is shown to be on intimate terms with the present administration?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think some very large contributions were made in the last campaign, but now that we are at war with Germany, it may be unpatriotic to mention such things. [Laughter.] It is intensely unpatriotic to refer to the jobs being created in this bill. Why, if I should say that 7,500 new Democratic job holders are to be fixed and taken away from conscription while the country is at war with Germany, through the passage of this bill, it would be unpatriotic. The President might not like it, and the gentleman from Alabama might come rushing down the aisle to denounce as pro-German anyone who would hint or suggest such a thing. But there are a large number of jobs in this bill, and they are going "to deserving Democrats," and the gentleman from Alabama and his colleagues just voted against civil-service regulations to control these appointments. I suppose that is unpatriotic. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes to enable my colleague, Mr. HAUGEN, to speak.

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes, so that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] may have that amount of time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, if there was any need for the two additional secretaries it does not exist at this time. As the chairman of the committee will agree, the plan was that the Secretary of Agriculture should serve as food dictator. That plan has been changed. We are to have another food dictator, Mr. Hoover. Now, I can not conceive that there is any need of any two additional secretaries, or a need for the additional $10,000 to be paid these two secretaries.

Another thing: There is no use in denying the fact that there is a sentiment in this country that the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Vrooman, is the best friend the farmer has. Many go to the extent of claiming that he is the only friend the farmer has. Some have gone so far as to suggest a change of the name of the department, and suggesting that the word "agriculture" should be dropped from the name of the department. I do not share in the opinion as to that.

I have often said that in the Department of Agriculture we have a corps of scientists; I believe the best in the world. So far as I know, every one of the 17,000 men in that department pursues his duty with fidelity and rectitude of purpose; but when I say that they are not agriculturists I can not be charged with criticizing the department or discrediting knowledge. Their knowledge is on certain lines. Knowledge is power. It always was and always will be power; and certainly in a Government like ours, that must rely upon the intelligence and morality of our people, and my advice to every young man is to seek for knowledge as he would for a hidden treasure. It is the greatest security for freedom. But the fact that a scientist may have a large number of textbooks and dime novels stored away does not qualify him as an expert in agriculture.

tI requires training and experience in agriculture as it requires experience in other lines of activity.

Now, then, that we have in the department a real farmer; now that we have a man with experience, whose heart is with the agricultural people, why undermine him in this way? Of course, under existing conditions it would not do to take him by the nape of the neck and throw him out; but the result will be the same. If we are to preserve the good will—whatever there may be of it in the country—toward the department, let us not undermine this man. If we have a man in whom we have confidence, why not leave him in the department?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. To which one of the officials does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HAUGEN. I am referring to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Vrooman.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman propose to move to strike out this section?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] moved to strike out the section.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in support of my statement, Mr. John A. McSparran, of Furniss, Pa., representing the National Grange, appeared before our committee, and I will read one sentence of his testimony. Remember, he represents thousands and thousands of farmers throughout the country. The National Grange is one of the largest and most useful agricultural organizations in the United States. Here is what he has to say:

We have provided a Department of Agriculture over here, and yet when we come in here on the question of oleomargarine we do not get any help from the Department of Agriculture. When we come here on the question of denatured alcohol we can not get any aid out of the Department of Agriculture. If it had been constructed expressly to help the Beef Trust and the Standard Oil Trust, it would not do it any better.

Now, gentlemen, that is the sentiment throughout the country. Representatives of these agricultural people have been here representing these various organizations, and many have voiced the same sentiment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information. What is there for these two additional secretaries to do?

Mr. HAUGEN. Nothing whatever. As I said, the first thought was to make the Secretary of Agriculture the food dictator, but that plan has been changed.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The food dictator has been provided for?

Mr. HAUGEN. The food dictator has been provided for, and there is no need for any additional secretaries.

Mr. SNOOK. I want to ask the gentleman a question along the line of the argument made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG]. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he believes that the provisions of section 10 of this bill, limiting the effect of the bill to the present emergency—that is, the present war—will limit the terms of office of these two Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, and that they will go out of office automatically at the end of that time?

Mr. LEVER. Unquestionably. There is no question in the minds of the committee about that.

Mr. SNOOK. Another question along the same line. In view of the argument made by the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished minority leader [Mr. MANN], the other day, that he never heard of anybody who had gone into office going out again, can the gentleman give us any hope that even if limited by this bill these offices will cease at the end of this emergency?

Mr. LEVER. The only way they could be continued would be by act of Congress, and that would be up to Congress.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LEVER. As soon as I complete my statement.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information pretty soon.

Mr. LEVER. All right. The reason why we are asking for these two assistant secretaries is that we have very largely increased the work of the Department of Agriculture in this bill if it goes through. We are going to provide between 3,500 and 4,000 additional employees. In addition to that the present Department of Agriculture controls the activities of 17,000 employees. It enforces 35 great statutes passed by Congress, and yet it has had no increase in its secretarial force since the act creating the Department of Agriculture was passed. Within recent years, since I have been a Member of Congress, the work of the Department of Agriculture has practically been quadrupled, and gentlemen who have been Members of the House as long as I have know that to be a fact. Within the last six years we have given to the Department of Agriculture the enforcement of the cotton-futures act, the grain-grades act, the Federal warehouse act, and various and sundry great big pieces of fundamental legislation.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Let me finish this. I want to give the House some information.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to help the gentleman do that.

Mr. LEVER. I happen to know personally that the Secretary of Agriculture is absolutely overwhelmed with the duties of his position. He is an overworked man now. Not only does he perform the duties of the Secretary of Agriculture, but he is on the Council of National Defense. He was selected to help locate the Federal reserve cities. Also, he is on the nitrate board, to select the location of the nitrate plants, and he needs assistance and needs it badly. Now, we provide in this bill that the terms of these two assistants shall cease at the end of this emergency. That is all there is to it, gentlemen.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I have a high regard for the gentleman except for his politics, and I want to ask him a question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to ask the gentleman if it would not be possible for two high-grade employees in the department to perform this service, and all the service that could be performed by creating these two additional offices of assistant secretaries?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think so, for this reason: If the Secretary of Agriculture happens to be away and the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture happens to be away, which frequently happens, there is nobody to sign the official mail of the Secretary except the Chief of the Weather Bureau.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Let us pass a little statute giving somebody authority to sign the mail.

Mr. LEVER. I think he needs the assistance of these men now.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Somebody signs his name to his mail now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] to strike out the section.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DOWELL) there were—ayes 42, noes 64.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. DOWELL and Mr. LEVER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 68.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do it for the purpose of asking the gentleman from South Carolina a question. I observe that section 6——

Mr. LEVER. We have concluded the debate on section 6.

Mr. GOOD. It is about the language in that section.

Mr. LEVER. We can do it by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will have that privilege.

Mr. GOOD. The language of section 6 is to the effect that these two additional assistant secretaries shall perform such duties as may be required by law or prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. The wording is rather peculiar, and the question I want to ask the gentleman is whether or not, if we adopt that provision, the Secretary of Agriculture can delegate to these assistants certain work not authorized by law?

Mr. LEVER. I should not think so.

Mr. GOOD. Then what is the object in stating it in the alternative in the bill?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman very frankly that this language was drawn by the department, and the committee did not change it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman from South Carolina permit a suggestion?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: Insert as a new section the following:

"The terms of all officials created by or under this act shall ipso facto expire at the termination of the existing state of war."

Mr. LEVER. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if he has read section 10?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes. There seems to be some question as to its effect, and I want to make it certain.

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman think there is any ambiguity about section 10?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It might not accomplish what I desire to accomplish, and this simply makes it certain.

Mr. LEVER. Why not offer it as an amendment to section 10?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have no objection to that. I will ask unanimous consent of the committee to withdraw it now.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Virginia will be permitted to withdraw his amendment for the present. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That for the purposes of this act the following sums are hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended: For the prevention, control, and eradication of the diseases and pests of live stock;

the enlargement of live-stock production; and the conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products, $2,010,000.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 24, strike out "$2,010,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$885,000."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman of the committee inform us whether he proposes to offer an amendment to other appropriation paragraphs?

Mr. LEVER. I think, Mr. Chairman, if I may make a brief statement it will clarify the situation. The bill as originally introduced carried $18,510,000. The original estimate by the Department of Agriculture was $25,000,000. The committee therefore reduced the Secretary's estimate by something over $6,000,000, but inasmuch as considerable time has elapsed from the reporting of the bill until this time I took it upon myself to consult the Secretary of Agriculture and made the suggestion to him that I thought it possible to reduce these appropriations. The Secretary took the matter under advisement and recommended to the committee in a supplemental statement a reduction of what was carried in the bill, as reported by the committee, of $2,579,300, making the estimate for this work $15,930,700.

The Secretary furnished me a memorandum of how these appropriations were to be expended. I went through it myself carefully and laid the memorandum before the committee. The committee itself then reduced the appropriation from $15,930,700 to $14,522,400, so that the total carried in the bill, as recommended by the committee, is $14,522,400.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What other appropriation bills will the Committee on Agriculture bring in in addition to this?

Mr. LEVER. The only other bill that the Committee on Agriculture has considered, or that the chairman has in mind, is the so-called food-control bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it under that bill that the so-called food dictatorship will be inaugurated?

Mr. LEVER. I would not call it a dictatorship, but a food administrator; yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not use the term in an offensive way. How much money will be provided for in that bill?

Mr. LEVER. The committee has not determined. The bill was introduced with the appropriation left blank. Neither the department nor anyone else has made any suggestion as to the amount.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I observe this section provides for funds to eradicate diseases and pests of live stock as well as to increase production. Has the gentleman any figures as to how these sums are to be expended?

Mr. LEVER. I can give the figures in the rough and shall be glad to do so. We shall expend out of this sum about $150,000 to undertake to increase the poultry production of the country. The chairman of the committee has had in mind that there were two ways of quick production of meat in this country—the pig and the poultry—and we are providing about $150,000 to organize poultry clubs and stimulate poultry production as much as we can.

We are providing about $46,000, in round numbers, for the encouragement of dairying in this country by the organization of dairy routes in sections of the country where dairying is not so well developed.

We propose, also, to spend $200,000 in attacking anthrax, blackleg, tuberculosis, and other animal diseases, with the exception of two mentioned specifically. In addition to that we are proposing $231,000 for a very strong attack upon hog cholera.

Then we propose to use $182,000 for a further drive upon the cattle tick, and about $12,000 to extend the eradication of dourine.

Mr. GOOD. Then, if I follow the gentleman correctly, one-half of the $800,000 will be spent for the eradication of diseases and pests and the remaining one-half for production.

Mr. LEVER. A little more than one-half for diseases.

Mr. GOOD. Now, the question I wanted to get at is, Does not the gentleman believe that instead of making appropriations of this kind in a lump sum it would be better to segregate them?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman and I do not agree on that proposition at all. The gentleman knows that if it had not been that we were acting under a tremendous pressure we would have brought in a bill with these segregations. The original bill as introduced by me at the instance of the Department of Agriculture—and there is no concealment about it—carried a lump sum appropriation of $25,000,000. The committee, knowing the attitude of Congress on the segregation of such appropriations, undertook to segregate as nearly as we could these appropriations.

Mr. GOOD. As the gentleman knows, I think it is a very dangerous practice.

Mr. LEVER. It is.

Mr. GOOD. Would the gentleman have any objection to striking out the word "expended," in line 20, and inserting "June 30, 1918," making it available for the fiscal year? These large sums ought not to be available until expended. Some bureau chief could practically, under the way moneys are expended in the departments, expend it for something that it ought not to be expended for.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman means 1919.

Mr. GOOD. No; for the fiscal year 1918. We will meet in December, 1917, and make appropriations for the next Agricultural appropriation bill, and that money will be available in 1919.

Mr. LEVER. The committee had this thought in mind in making the funds available until expended, and that was that probably the department would feel more free in working out the program if it knew that it was going to have the funds; but if the gentleman has any serious objections to it, I do not think the committeee would object to his amendment.

Mr. GOOD. That is what we have been doing in large appropriations for carrying on the war.

Mr. LEVER. I think the committee will have no objections if the gentleman will offer his amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a commentary upon this situation which may be interesting. This bill was introduced into the House on May 4. It was reported to the House on May 7 with this paragraph in it. Since May 7 the Committee on Agriculture of the House have given further investigation and consideration to the matter. As originally introduced, the paragraph contained $2,010,000, and the committee now offers an amendment to reduce that sum to $825,000. The same item precisely was introduced in a bill in the Senate on May 21. That was after the Committee on Agriculture in the House had obtained its information from the Secretary of Agriculture, which caused the House committee to reduce the sum of $2,010,000 to $825,000. The bill was introduced in the Senate by request, by Senator GORE, the request evidently being the request of the Department of Agriculture. As I say, that was on May 21. On May 23 it was reported to the Senate. Evidently the Secretary of Agriculture had not given the same information to the Senate Committee on Agriculure that he had given to the House Committee on Agriculture, because, while the House Committee on Agriculture, after receiving the information, recommended a reduction of the appropriation for this item from over $2,000,000 to less than $900,000, the Senate committee recommended an increase of the item from $2,000,000 to $4,500,000. What are the sources of information which these committees have? Here is precisely the same item, one in a bill in the House and the other in the bill in the Senate. At the same dates they get their information, and the House committee on the information that it receives proposes to cut a $2,000,000 appropriation in half, and the Senate committee proposes to double it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Not now. I wonder what the conferees will do. Is the purpose of this amendment, not intentional of course upon the part of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], to fool the House into agreeing to the item and then have the Department of Agriculture insist that the amount they have asked for in the Senate shall be the amount taken by the conferees, which more than doubles this amount?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. The object of my speech is to get the gentleman interested.

Mr. LEVER. I am not sure that I state correctly the facts, but I shall undertake to verify them as soon as I can leave the floor conveniently. My impression is that the same memorandum furnished me by Secretary Houston on May 22 was furnished to the Senate Committee on Agriculture at the same time; and I may say further to the gentleman that I think the gentleman knows the conferees from this side of the House well enough to know that they take fairly good care of the House on these propositions.

Mr. MANN. It is such a remarkable proposition.

Mr. LEVER. It is a very remarkable proposition.

Mr. MANN. Of course the Senate included in its recommendation an amendment to insert the words "hog cholera, cattle ticks, and contagious abortion of cattle," but that was already covered by the language of the House. How does it happen that with the same bill in two different bodies, acted upon by two committees on the same information from the Department of Agriculture—if it is the same information, and I do not know about that—each one endeavoring to comply with the wishes of the department, one reduces the appropriation from $2,000,000 to eight hundred thousand and odd dollars and the other increases the appropriation from $2,000,000 to $4,500,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the criticisms directed against this bill and the same bill now being considered in the other end of the Capitol. I would not be candid with myself or with gentlemen of the House, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, if I did not get up here now and state that so far as the particular items in this bill are concerned there is not a member of our committee who is satisfied with the evidence presented to us by the Agricultural Department. This bill has not had the consideration at the hands of our committee that the annual appropriation bills have. The fact of the matter is that they lost their heads down there in the department, and many items submitted in the bill as originally introduced have been withdrawn in supplemental estimates.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I suggest that they ought to have at least two more Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I tacitly agreed that this bill should come out of the committee, and do you know why I did it? This bill was a part of a bigger proposition. Oh, there are some good items in the bill, and I shall discuss some of them. The bill, as I say, was a part of a bigger proposition that came before our committee for consideration, and that bigger proposition was to find some man in this Nation who has more brain and intellect than the combined American people and give to him the power to fix the prices of the farm products of this country in the hands of the farmer! I would not be candid with myself or with this House if I did not say to you now that I agreed that the propositions now under consideration should be cut out of the other bill and be considered as a separate measure. I would willingly vote to tax the American people $18,500,000 as proposed in the bill under consideration and run the risk of much of it being wasted rather than grant the other proposition that is in the bill now pending before the committee, namely, to name some man as food dictator of this country who can autocratically fix the price of the stuff that the farmers in my district and in yours grow. [Applause.] So I agreed that this bill should come out. I am doing my utmost to defeat the proposition of granting such power to any man or any set of men. I am talking about myself individually; I am not speaking for anyone else. It will be remembered that I made a little speech on the floor the other day in which I took issue with one of my colleagues. I did touch this bill in the high places. I practiced law for a good many years, and I have had cases that had weak points in them, and I always found it a good policy, if I wanted to win my case, in discussing it to smooth over the weak points and come out strong on the stronger ones. There were two items in the bill that I discussed with some emphasis. One was for $500,000 which they led us to believe was going to be expended to eradicate hog cholera, and now they come in with a supplementary estimate and tell us that they can not spend but little more than $200,000 for that purpose, and there I am on record in that talk as telling you in advance of this bill that $500,000 was to be expended in that way.

Now, see what shape I am in. [Laughter.]

Another proposition I thought was a strong point in the bill, and that was in the statement made before the committee, I was led to believe that $500,000 was to be spent for the cattle-tick item. I knew I could support that. Now, in the supplemental estimate they say they will be able to use less than $200,000 on this important item.

I want to say to you that I am just in a position where there are develish few of the items in this bill I can defend. As an emergency proposition, I am going to vote for it; I am going to swallow it. I do not want to do anything that would cripple our Government in this emergency which is confronting us, and I am willing to risk the expenditure that will help create a food supply in this country. But God pity the man in the Agricultural Department that would waste one dollar of this trust fund on useless salaries for men that ought not to be employed! [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to oppose the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. The Chair will observe that section 9 is a section which contains what in an ordinary appropriation bill would be numbered paragraphs. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the Chair would hold that the subparagraphs in section 9 are really not paragraphs, and section 9 could be considered as a whole?

Mr. TOWNER. Let me suggest that that might be subject to the rule of appropriation bills, because these are appropriation paragraphs, and each paragraph should be considered separately.

Mr. LEVER. I am asking for information.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman will agree it would be perhaps best to consider them separately, does he not?

Mr. LEVER. I think I should if I could be assured there was not going to be interminable debate on the proposition.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me suggest that this debate will occur in any event.

Mr. LEVER. Probably. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that I am anxious to complete the bill this afternoon, and if we can do that I have no objection at all.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is there any reason why we can not agree as to time when we will reach the final vote on the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that the gentleman could reach the question very readily by asking unanimous consent that this section be considered as one paragraph. That was done the other day in respect to another bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this portion of the bill be considered under the rule governing appropriation bills, and that amendments be offered at the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this particular section shall be considered by paragraphs.

Mr. MANN. We were considering it by paragraphs.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point whether or not it should be considered by paragraphs or by the entire section, and then go back and offer amendments. I am trying to know what to do in order to make the most time.

Mr. MANN. The section is an appropriation section. I suppose under the practice it would be considered by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. Is there objection to it?

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to it. I think we should make time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I regret that my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was not here to listen to the address of the distinguished Representative from Texas [Mr. YOUNG]. I think he and I might have differed as to the patriotism of the gentleman from Texas, because that speech was not in entire harmony with the bill, the bill being an administration bill, which should have been defended by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG], being a member of the committee, is not satisfied with the bill the committee presents. I hope that is not giving aid and comfort to the enemy. I hope no German spy may pick up that bit of information and harry the soul of the gentleman from Alabama, the defender of the administration. But what the gentleman from Texas said and what was said before the gentleman from Texas spoke, illustrates more than anything else that Congress ought not to abdicate its constitutional functions in matters of this kind. Congress now is confronted——

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). With this strange proposition.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield; yes.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman from Texas was only expressing a predicament of a Democratic Congressman who is caught short on appropriations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I take it he was expressing a mild regret for a bill he approves. But the matter confronting the Congress is this, that a department representating the administration, which asks everybody to be quiet and not talk about public expenditures, presents estimates for $25,000,000.

Then by a system of conferences the estimate is changed and revised until the bill finally calls for only $14,000,000. In other words, the original estimate made by the department is cut substantially in half, and as the bill comes to the House even the members of the committee are not united upon it.

This bill provides for certain emergency expenditures. I suppose they are sacred because we are at war with Germany. We are expected to pass this bill without question, apparently, because, according to the gentleman from Alabama, it might be "giving aid and comfort to the enemy," if we suggest even that the bill provides for certain jobs that are already covered by the Agricultural bill.

Let us see: The first appropriation paragraph of the bill provides for an expenditure of $2,010,000. The committee comes in and drops the amount to $885,000 without giving any special reason as to why the Secretary of Agriculture or the administration changed its mind. We have already appropriated, up until June 30, 1918, a total of $3,555,000 for the Bureau of Animal Industry, which is to receive this $885,000 additional. For what is this additional sum needed?

The next paragraph provides for an expenditure of $6,500,000, which, I suppose, will be cut down when we reach it—voluntarily cut down by the committee itself—whereas in the pending bill we have provided for the Bureau of Plant Industry $3,143,000. This is a big addition to sums already in hand.

I could run on, showing how we have already appropriated $24,000,000 for the very purposes that are provided for in this bill. It has been stated here—and it has not been denied—that it is proposed to create 7,500 new places by the additional appropriation provided for in this so-called war emergency measure. I presume from the viewpoint of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] that it is still unpatriotic to refer to a matter of this kind, and yet I commend to the Members of the House the utterances of the distinguished gentleman from Texas, who "let the cat out of the bag" as to the "sacredness" of this measure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROSE and Mr. SUMNERS rose.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the committee amendment be closed at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment, which is a committee amendment, be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REAVIS: On page 5, at the end of line 24, add the following:

"Provided, however, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used in the payment of the salary of any employee who is less than 31 years of age."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have no desire to take five minutes in discussing the amendment I have offered. I want no time further than may be sufficient to state the purpose of the amendment. I have grown somewhat tired of the repeated stories that are being told about men high in the public life of the Nation who were very eager for America to become a participant in this war and yet have ever since war was declared been making every effort to get their own sons in places of safety. I do not intend any reflection on any given individual, but I have not the greatest admiration in the world for the patriotism of a man or of the men who wanted this country to engage in this war with the secret intention in their minds that it should be fought by the sons of other men.

There are many Members of this House who have contributed their sons to the service of their country with no restriction or limitation upon the dangers to which they shall be subjected, nor upon the hardships which they will endure. My colleague from my own State [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] in a very short time will be informed that the son he has given to his country's cause will be crossing the ocean on his way to the trenches of France. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has a boy to-day somewhere on the sea. He does not know where; he does not know what he is doing nor what danger is lurking and waiting upon him. The Speaker of this House has given his only son to the service of his country without restriction, without limitation. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BACON], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], as well as many other Members, have offered the greatest hopes of their lives upon the altar of the Nation. [Applause.] The membership of this House has given more than any similar body in the Nation.

I want to see this bill fixed, if possible, so that it will not make places for 7,500 slackers who, by the provisions of this bill, will get into the employ of the Nation and thereby be withdrawn from liability to the selective draft. [Applause.] If we must make places for 7,500 men, if it is necessary at this time to do it, I am in favor of it; but let us put in this employment and in these places men that are beyond the age of the selective draft, and not make these places a perfect harbor for the slackers of America and for the men who want their sons assigned to places of safety during the progress of this war. I hope that the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that the amendment is in order. I am doubtful if it is subject to a point of order, and therefore I shall withdraw the point of order.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], as I always do, because he always enlightens the House when he addresses it, and I am in sympathy with a good deal that he says. But it does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that he is going rather far when he attempts to fix by statute the age at which employees of the department may be taken into the public service, and as I understand the gentleman's amendment it undertakes to do that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman agree to an amendment providing that no persons employed under the provisions of this bill should be exempt from conscription?

Mr. LEVER. I would not object to that.

Mr. REAVIS. With that understanding I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to it, although there may be serious objections to it. The question is sprung suddenly on me, but for the time being I think I would accept the proposition. I may want to study it in conference.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] may have an opportunity to offer the amendment that he sends to the desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that his colleague may have the opportunity to have read an amendment at the desk for information. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "necessary," in line 12, on page 7, the following: "Provided, That the employment of any person under the provisions of this act shall not except any such person from military service under the provisions of the selective draft law approved May 18, 1917."

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Nebraska will withdraw his amendment, I will make no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have leave to offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request preferred by the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Nebraska will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment in the hands of the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the word "necessary," in line 12, on page 7, the following:

"Provided, That the employment of any person under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any such person from military service under the provisions of the selective-draft law approved May 18, 1917."

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will permit me just a minute. I do not care to make any speech, but I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee that I offer the amendment to this bill not only to have it apply to this act, but to serve notice on these civilian employees in other departments of the Government that the Congress of the United States does not favor the policy that will permit them to be excused from military service, as has been advocated in the columns of some of the Washington newspapers. We want these men to take their chances along with the other boys. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Would not the gentleman enlarge his amendment so as to apply to the whole public service?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not think that would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the vote will be taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois at this time.

There was no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has an amendment to perfect the section, and as my amendment is to strike out I have no objection to his offering his first.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "expended," in line 20, page 5, and inserting the words "June 30, 1918."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 20, strike out the word "expended" and insert in lieu thereof the words "June 30, 1918."

Mr. LEVER. The committee has no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 17, strike out lines 17 to 24, inclusive.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very glad that the committee has reduced the amount this bill carries from $2,210,000 to something over $800,000. I am sure they acted wisely. I believe there are very few Members who would not gladly have supported what purported to be the object of this bill. This bill is known as the food-census bill. I am as much in favor of taking this food census as any member of the committee or any Member of the House can be. I think it should be done, but I am informed that to take the food census as contemplated by the department would only have cost about $600,000, and yet the department comes before Congress in the first place and asks for a lump-sum appropriaton of $25,000,000.

It is evident they had not considered how they would expend this money, for we find that when they come to give estimates upon the items as required by the committee it was reduced at once to $18,500,000. We find, again, that upon a reconsideration the amount was again reduced to about $14,000,000.

Now, gentlemen, is it necessary that any of these additional appropriations should be made? I ask your attention——

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield? I know the gentleman wants to be correct in his facts. The department's estimate for $25,000,000 was reduced by the committee to $18,500,000. At the suggestion of the members of the committee the Secretary himself voluntarily asked that that amount be reduced $2,579,000, and the committee further reduced it.

Mr. TOWNER. I agree with the gentleman that the committee has endeavored to deal fairly with the House and the country, but I am submitting now to the Members of this House, to the members of this larger committee, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the question as to whether we ought to make any additional appropriation than that for a food census. Gentlemen will know, if they have been familiar with general Agricultural appropriation bills in this House, that this appropriation contained in this paragraph is in reality an additional appropriation for the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Now, the regular appropriation bill already passed and now a law carried $3,555,326 for this Bureau of Animal Industry, including liberal appropriations for the very items contained in this bill. That amount has already been made available for the use of this department.

This bill makes a lump-sum appropriation for the prevention of diseases of live stock, for the enlargement of live stock production, and for the conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products. This is the declared purpose of the paragraph in the pending bill. Gentlemen, if they will examine the appropriation bill we have already passed, will find that for salaries of the officers engaged in the Bureau of Animal Industry we have already appropriated $440,370; for inspection and quarantine work, $628,280; for the eradication of the southern cattle tick, $631,560. It may be pertinently suggested that it would be somewhat difficult to set in motion new machinery for the eradication of the southern cattle tick through an appropriation of this sort. New organizations can not be effected, and the only extensions of present activities practicable is by adding more men. To say the department needs more men to eradicate the cattle tick, or to stamp out hog cholera, is to give little idea of how the money may be expended to bring about the desired results. The estimates of the department were made the basis for appropriations already given. But there are no estimates upon which to base this new appropriation. We only know the department wants to enlarge the number of its employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. For the dairy industry $378,930 was appropriated in the regular appropriation bill. I am as much interested in the dairy interests of the country as any member on the floor of this House, and I do not believe that now additional appropriations can be made that will be utilized without extravagance and without great loss and waste. Already we have expended $277,580 for special investigations all along the line in the Bureau of Animal Industry, and for further investigation $134,000, and for the investigation and control of hog cholera, $413,000. Certainly the men of Iowa who have a greater interest in the swine industry than any other State would be glad if something really practical could be done to eradicate hog cholera, but we are quite sure, all of us, I think, that all of the money that can be effectively expended by the department has already been appropriated in the regular appropriation bill. For meat inspection we have already appropriated $501,620.

Would it be wise now to go to the country asking for these extraordinary appropriations when every dollar of this appropriation and every dollar of these other enormous appropriations must come from taxation to be placed upon the people? Would it be wise to go to our constituents and attempt to defend such appropriations as this under the guise that it is for the purpose of carrying on the war in Europe? It seems to me that it must be apparent to every man that we certainly can not successfully defend such a claim, and therefore I believe that we would be acting wisely, that we would be acting fairly and justly, if we should strike out these extraordinary appropriations that have nothing whatever to do with the carrying on of the war in Europe. If I thought that one million or ten million dollars could be added to this bill that would in reality more effectively prepare us for the emergency that confronts us, I would certainly be in favor of voting for it, but I can not defend, because it is impossible, in my judgment, to defend, these large appropriations that must be expended, almost every dollar, in the salaries of additional men who will be selected by this administration to go into the field, to little or no purpose so far as practical results are concerned. To put 7,000 additional men on the pay roll can not add in any considerable degree, if at all, to the production of food products in this country during the war. If that be true, there is no justification for the large appropriation carried in this bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object in order that I may ask the chairman of the committee a question, and if he can answer it I shall not object.

Mr. LEVER. I was going to take five minutes myself in order to answer questions.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman had better extend his time, then, three or four minutes, because he is going to need it. I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee just one question. The appropriations which he mentioned a while ago, those which are already specified, I think he gave as amounting to about half of the $885,000. Is the other half for administrative purposes?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, it covers a great deal more than that. There is one item of $150,000, one of $40,000, one of $200,000, another of $230,000, another of $200,000, and one of $12,000.

Mr. MEEKER. That practically covers the entire amount.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that following the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], the last half hour's discussion of this bill has had more to do with upsetting my belief in the whole proposition than the proceedings down to that time. I am sure that the House has absolute confidence in the committee, and yet we find that even in the committee itself there is a wide difference of opinion as to what these appropriations are for and as to whether they will really be of service. It seems to me that we should set this one policy on appropriations during this session especially: That unless this Congress can be convinced that there is absolute, imperative need for the administration of our domestic institutions for an appropriation we should spend less money during this stress than we do at other times. Whenever we can pry off a million or two—of course, that is a very insignificant sum these days—or a hundred millions, we should do so and thereby economize at home. We are going to the country soon with a tax bill that will amount to $1,250,000,000 to be placed as a further burden upon the people.

Mr. COX. One billion eight hundred million dollars.

Mr. MEEKER. Oh, the Senate is going to cut that amount down.

The gentleman from Iowa raised a very practical question as to whether under the appropriations made in the regular annual appropriation bill brought in by the committee, with the addition of $150,000 in one place and $200,000 in another concerning hog cholera, cattle tick, and things of that sort, it would be possible to use that much more money when the machinery of the department for this year has already been set in motion. When that practical question was raised I felt that the Members of the House should have a right to know from the committee or from the department how it will be possible for them during this year to render any great service to the country by simply having this additional amount of money. I will say to the chairman that during the consideration of his bill in the last session I was glad, representing a city constituency, to follow most eagerly every suggestion he had to make as to the increase of appropriations for the control of these animal diseases and plant diseases and things of that sort, which do vitally affect the whole economic and food problem of America. But when we find gentlemen like the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], who comes from an agricultural district, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] pointing out the fact that these appropriations will be of no practical service this year, surely it seems to me that when a department knows nothing more about its business than the department that has spoken here, when it comes within about $14,000,000 of being right on a $25,000,000 appropriation, it is time for the Congress not to pass this bill this afternoon, nor to pass it next week, if necessary, until we have had an opportunity to hear from the department again, and maybe it will turn out that $6,000,000 will do the whole job. If the chief function and purpose of this bill is to pay salaries, I am against it. If it is for giving information to the people and actually spending this money where it is going to increase our food supply, and if that is the business of the department, then let us vote all the money necessary. But the last hour's discussion has done more to knock my faith in this whole proposition than anything that has come up yet during the week, and I hope that the chairman will not insist on our going to a vote on this immediately. Pumpkins will grow, and so will greens, during to-day and during next week, whether this bill passes or not. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can say much that will interest the committee or seek to do anything except to confirm my present judgment not to vote for this bill.

Under the leadership of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], representing his committee, we appropriated, in round numbers, $27,000,000 at the last session of Congress for the Agricultural Department for the coming fiscal year. Since that time, however, war has been declared, and now the gentleman from South Carolina comes with this bill asking $20,000,000 more on account of the war, which he reduces to $14,000,000. Now, let us see for a minute. This bill was prepared and I believe reported on the supposition that the Secretary of Agriculture would be the food dictator from this on, or at least during the coming fiscal year; and this bill provides two Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, who, with the present one, make three Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture. So far as I know, the Secretary of Agriculture is an efficient one. I am throwing no stones at any individual. The bill was introduced and reported upon the theory that the Secretary of Agriculture would be food dictator for the coming fiscal year; but now it is an open secret, proclaimed daily, that he is not to be food dictator, but that a man by the name of Hoover—is that his name?—is to be food dictator, responsible, as he has stated, according to the newspapers, in public speeches, to the President alone. The President and Hoover, or Hoover and the President, are to dictate the food prices. Now I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] if that bill that has been introduced and spoken of several times, which in effect is to make Mr. Hoover food dictator with a great personnel, is to be reported from his committee?

Mr. LEVER. If the committee agrees with the chairman, the bill will undoubtedly be reported.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. Then I will say that the reason for passing this bill disappears, because this wonderful department has grown and grown and grown in usefulness, and by a bill that passed in February last, at the expense of $29,000,000, is prepared to care for the service of the Agricultural Department for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It got all the money it asked for then.

Mr. CANNON. I believe it got all the money it asked for; at least it received liberal appropriations. Now, the reason for the present bill having disappeared, do you not think we had better not only strike out this paragraph but defeat the whole bill?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman forgotten that it is suggested that we need two new Secretaries of Agriculture to sign the Secretary's name when he is absent?

Mr. CANNON. They were probably inserted on the theory that the Secretary of Agriculture would perform the duties that Mr. Hoover is to perform, responsible alone to the President. If Mr. Hoover is intrusted with that power and is to fix the prices and control the sale of agricultural products, he will need an army of assistants that will amount in the aggregate to more than the Agricultural Department now costs to maintain its thousands of employees. Somebody says it will cost $75,000,000 per annum. God only knows.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire the committee to understand very fully the situation that confronts us. The gentlemen who are moving to strike out this appropriation, and who are supporting the motion to strike it out, are against this bill in toto. They are against the food survey of this bill, they are against the seed provision of this bill, and they are against the appropriations here by which we hope to stimulate production and at the same time to stimulate the conservation of the food supply of this Nation. Do not misunderstand the situation. It is perfectly patent to me that by befogging the issue here gentlemen would strike from this bill important provisions which are absolutely necessary if during the next 12 months we are going to stimulate the production of food in this country, and if we are going to conserve that food when it has been produced. Do not misunderstand the situation.

Now, I yield for a question.

Mr. MOON. I wanted to ask the gentleman how much money this bill carried.

Mr. LEVER. It carries something more than $14,000,000.

Mr. MOON. How much of that is in addition to appropriations that have already been made?

Mr. LEVER. For this purpose?

Mr. MOON. For similar purposes.

Mr. LEVER. I can not tell the gentleman offhand, but the total appropriation for the Department of Agriculture, in round numbers, is $25,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. Over $27,000,000.

Mr. LEVER. Not all of that increase goes to this purpose at all. I should say that probably, without figuring it up, five or six million dollars are appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. MOON. Can the gentleman tell what the exact duties of these men that must be employed will be?

Mr. LEVER. I can. If you will permit me to proceed, I will do it.

Mr. MOON. They are going to enforce the sections of the bill that provide for the ascertainment of the amount of food supply, and so forth, in the United States?

Mr. LEVER. Six hundred thousand dollars of this will go to the food survey.

Mr. MOON. How many employees are carried in this bill?

Mr. LEVER. About 3,500.

Mr. MOON. In all?

Mr. LEVER. In all.

Mr. MOON. They are to be paid what salaries?

Mr. LEVER. The salaries differ. They run from $600 up to $2,400.

Mr. MOON. There is nothing in this bill fixing the salaries?

Mr. LEVER. No.

Mr. MOON. I want to ask the gentleman this: Does this bill confer the power upon the Department of Agriculture in the use of these employees to take possession of and control and confiscate for Government use or any use corn, wheat, and potatoes and other seeds of that sort in the hands of the individual farmers of this country?

Mr. LEVER. It does not. It was specifically amended on the floor yesterday so as to prevent that, and it never was in the minds of the committee to grant such authority.

Mr. MOON. It would not permit any sort of taking of it at all?

Mr. LEVER. Absolutely not.

Mr. MOON. So that this section of the bill that provides that they may take and pay such prices for seed as the Government desires is not now to be considered as a part of the bill?

Mr. LEVER. It is a part of the bill, but the provision is made that it shall not apply to seed in the hands of the producer of the seed. That was an amendment that was passed yesterday.

Mr. MOON. I was not here yesterday at the time and did not know of the amendment proposed. Now, does the gentleman think that these extraordinary powers that are given here and this increase in the appropriation and the large increase in employees of the Government are in any way essential at this particular time?

Mr. LEVER. I do think so, and I was going to show why.

Mr. MOON. I will be glad if the gentleman will show me why, because these are powers that ought not to be exercised if it is possible to avoid it.

Mr. LEVER. That is true, and ordinarily I would not support this myself.

Mr. MOON. They are against our views of government and against all ideas of democracy and republicanism. This power should not be used except in an imperative emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the next amendment, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For procuring, storing and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 5 of this act; the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture; and the conservation and utilization of plant products, $6,500,000.

Mr. LEVER and Mr. RAKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], the chairman of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 24, strike out "five" and in lieu thereof insert "four."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. There is nothing like that on page 5.

Mr. LEVER. Evidently the Clerk has a copy of the bill that I do not have down here. Has he the copy of the bill that was reported from the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. The Clerk informs the Chair he has.

Mr. LEVER. There are two prints of this bill, and it makes confusion. Let me alter the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I will say that I have an amendment here that covers both of those items.

Mr. LEVER. It is on the top of page 6, line 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 1, strike out the word "five" and insert "four," so that it will read "authorized by section 4 of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield, then, to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, changing the total.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 4, strike out "$6,500,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$6,219,000."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. An amendment has just been adopted, on page 6, line 1, striking out "five" and inserting "four." That is as the sections are numbered in this bill. Does the gentleman remember that section 2 was stricken out?

Mr. LEVER. The Clerk will be authorized to make these corrections.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Would he make that correction we have just made?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will be authorized to make that correction.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk would not be authorized to change an amendment which is agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Then, that amendment there ought, by unanimous consent, to be made to read "section 3" instead of "section 4."

Mr. MANN. What ought to be done in all these cases is to strike out "section 5" and leave it "authorized by this act," and not state every particular number.

Mr. LEVER. I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman would strike out the language "section 5" it would cover the case.

Mr. GOOD. That practically would make a lump sum of $14,000,000, any part of which could be expended for doing anything that is enumerated in this bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GOOD. No; I am not mistaken.

Mr. MANN. The authorization is in the act.

Mr. LEVER. Amend it so that the language will read "section 3 of this act" instead of "section 4."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks to modify the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not be recognized now.

Mr. RAKER. Why not?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 4, strike out "$6,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,219,000."

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa an amendment to this amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAUGEN offers the following amendment: Page 6, line 1, after the word "act," strike out the semicolon and insert a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not seem to be an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. It sets aside a certain sum for the purchase of seed, and $200,000 for the other purposes. It separates the appropriations.

Mr. LEVER. I thought the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] was going to offer that amendment. I have no objection to it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I sent an amendment to the desk a moment ago. I thought I was recognized before the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa, a member of the committee, was recognized to offer an amendment to the amendment. Is this an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 1, after the word "act," strike out the semicolon and insert a comma, and after the comma the word "for," and in line 4, page 6, strike out "$6,500,000" and insert "$200,000."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, that sets aside $6,000,000 for the purchase of seeds and $200,000 for the other purposes of the section.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] had agreed upon an amendment. I would oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa for the reason that it proposes to expend only $5,800,000 for the procurement of seeds. It is proposed to expend $72,000 for rust and smut work and $19,000 for enlarging the work on vegetables, peas, and beans, and $150,000 for work on perishable products by the dehydrating process and other processes, and for the Bureau of Animal Industry $200,000. If the gentleman would modify his amendment so as to carry the segregation as agreed upon I would be willing to accept it. That would give what the committee provided.

Mr. HAUGEN. What is the $150,000 for?

Mr. LEVER. For the conservation of perishable products.

Mr. HAUGEN. We made liberal appropriations for the other items in our annual appropriation bill. We appropriated $25,929,113, much of it for work contemplated in this bill. However, I will accept the gentleman's suggestion. My purpose was to set aside a certain sum for the purchase of seeds, so that we may know what is provided for that purpose and not for the "joy rides" and what might be done otherwise. I accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman making it $5,570,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Will he give the figures to the Clerk?

Mr. LEVER. It is $5,777,000. I have no objection to making it $5,777,000 instead of $6,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the amendment provides that the five million and odd dollars be expended for seeds in this appropriation?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not been able to get the totals yet.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while they are fixing it, I want to say a word in the hope that we may make a further modification.

I called attention a little while ago to the fact that upon the first appropriation in this section the House committee, on the same information that the Senate committee had, proposed to reduce the appropriation from $2,000,000 to less than $1,000,000, while the Senate committee proposed to increase the appropriation from $2,000,000 to $4,500,000; and I might have said then, if I had wanted to stop at that item, that it was natural to suppose that the House, in an economical frame of mind, always reduces the appropriation, while the Senate, noted for extravagance, increases it. But in this case here are two items which are identical, in precisely the same language in the House bill as in the Senate bill. The department asked for $6,500,000. The House committee, in a spirit of economy, has suggested to the House that it be reduced to $6,219,000, which is cutting off something less than $300,000. But the Senate was really economical. The Senate committee proposed to reduce the item from $6,500,000 to $2,500,000, saving $4,000,000.

Mr. LEVER. How about the item above that, where they increased it about $2,000,000?

Mr. MANN. I have spoken about that; but the two items have nothing to do with each other.

Now, I agree with the gentleman from South Carolina on the preceding item, and I am inclined to agree with the Senate committee on this item. On the same information the Senate committee thought this item ought to be $2,500,000. The House committee recommend over $6,000,000. What is going to be done with it? Nobody has told us.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. They are going to spend it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The Senate committee acted on information from the Department of Agriculture. On the other item evidently the distinguished Senators acted on their own information and did not take the information furnished them by the Department of Agriculture as accurate. I should like to know whether in this case the Senate committee acted upon the information of the Department of Agriculture and the House committee acted upon the information of its individual members?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will yield to me I will answer that question.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can get his own time always. I believe we ought to be a little economical. I am in favor of giving to the department everything it can use. I believe the Senate have figured out all that can be done under this item. Every man in the United States who is not essential in the work of direction ought to be engaged in the work of production. Every cent of money ought to be saved that can be saved.

Mr. RAKER. I should like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the amendment be reported as modified. Let us get that straightened out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAUGEN offers the following modified amendment: Page 6, line 1, after the word "act," strike out the semicolon and insert a comma, and after the comma insert "$5,578,000; for"; in line 4, page 6, strike out "$6,500,000" and insert "$441,000," so that as amended the paragraph will read:

"For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 5 of this act, $5,578,000; for the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture, and the conservation and utilization of plant products, $441,000."

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to either of those amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] as modified.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. I desire to offer an amendment to this section, and I do not want to be cut out of my opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will not be cut out.

Mr. LEVER. Let us vote on this, and then the gentleman can come in with his amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I would rather be heard now and offer my amendment later. I want to be heard for five minutes if I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the purpose of this bill is to stimulate food production, to actually produce food supplies for the American people. You will find in lines 2 and 3 that a large sum is appropriated for the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases. Now, I am going to ask the chairman of the committee if he would have any objection to inserting, after the word "diseases," in line 2, the words "and animals"?

Mr. ANDERSON. If the chairman does not object, I will.

Mr. RAKER. I did not ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether he would object or not.

Mr. LEVER. The chairman of the committee would very seriously object to that.

Mr. RAKER. Well, now, that shows how little some people know. I am going to talk plainly, because I am talking of facts as they actually exist.

We are expecting to spend millions of dollars for the purpose of examination and for the eradication of insects, for the purpose of finding out how many insects to destroy that are injurious to agriculture; and, as a matter of fact, every western man knows that in certain localities from one-eighth to one-third of every man's crop is actually destroyed by the animals—rodents—that are raised, reared, and bred upon the public domain. The Biological Survey in certain parts of the United States has done wonderful service and has practically eradicated these animals by which crops are destroyed. I want to tell this House that in the States of Nevada and Oregon and California I have ridden miles and miles and have observed places where a third or half of a man's crop has been absolutely and literally destroyed by the squirrels and animals bred upon the public domain. Now, if you want to conserve the crops of the farmers, if you want actually to put grain into the farmer's bin and hay into his stacks, why do you not give the Biological Survey some money with which they can destroy these pests that are being bred upon the public domain?

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKENZIE. How do they destroy these animals?

Mr. RAKER. They destroy them with poison. I have seen them do it. I have followed them in the field. They go out in the spring and summer, and by poisoning these animals they save thousands of acres of as fine grain as was ever sown.

Now, here is a sample from men that I know, men who live in Surprise Valley, one of the most productive valleys in California. I have ridden up and down that valley for the last 30 years, and I have seen at least one-third of these immense fields destroyed. They were destroyed by animals, by squirrels that came from the forest reserve. Let me read:

FORT BIDWELL, CAL., May 12, 1917.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RAKER: I am inclosing petition signed by most of the farmers in this vicinity asking for Federal aid in the extermination of the ground squirrel. It seems a fair petition inasmuch as they are not asking that the Government work on deeded land, but on the Government lands adjoining.

Knowing the conditions as they exist here, we thought you could do more than they could get done by sending the petitions direct. Others from Surprise Valley will probably reach you shortly.

Thanking you for your attention to the matter, I beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

R. R. BAKER, Cashier.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, farmers in the Surprise Valley, Modoc County, State of California, respectfully petition that you endeavor to get us Federal aid in the extermination of ground squirrels on vacant Government land adjoining our farms. We are effectively using poisons and other means of exterminating the squirrels on our own lands, but in this country where there is so much range lands joining us it is impossible for us to work on them there. As it now is, we may rid our lands of the pest, but within a week after they will be as plentiful as before, coming on us from the outside lands.

In view of the fact that the President has asked us to produce as much crop for the country as we can and our desire to do so being manifested by an extra large acreage, it appears to us that we should have the aid of the Government in an endeavor to rid our crop lands of the ground-squirrel pest. We are doing our part on our own land, and if the Government will do what it can on the Government land near us we believe that it will be the means of very materially increasing the yield in this valley.

C. H. Fee, E. P. Sessions, Fred A. Ash, Mrs. R. F. McConnaughy, James H. Conlan, E. W. Conlan, Mary Conlan, Arthur Miles, Geo. W. Bucher, R. C. Mulkey, Roger Munroe, Ora Hanks, Joe Conlan, Hugh McManus, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Bucher, David Baty, W. B. Routson, E. A. Peterson, H. H. Peterson, E. G. Peterson, L. H. Sessions, A. H. Sessions, Harve Drew, H. L. Heryford, W. H. Schamp, Jacob Neasham.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from California will permit, I want to see if we can not get along by agreeing on closing debate. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I am much interested in what the gentleman is saying. Are these squirrels suitable for food?

Mr. RAKER. No; they are not.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I thought perhaps we might conserve the food supply by killing them.

Mr. MEEKER. Could not we give the food dictator power to make them edible?

Mr. RAKER. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri means business. He does not believe in sending men out to tell men what to do in sowing grain or harvesting their crops when he has a thousand acres in wheat and knows that before the season is over one-third of it will be destroyed by the squirrels that are bred and reared on the public domain.

A MEMBER. A thousand acres?

Mr. RAKER. Why, a thousand acres of wheat in California is a bagatelle. Now, I want to call attention to the fact that our law of the State compels a man to kill the squirrels on his own land, and the farmers are doing it. If a man fails to do it the expense of killing them by the State becomes a lien on his land and his land is sold to pay it. Notwithstanding he kills the squirrels and animals on his own land, right adjoining for 100 miles along the mountain range are the forest reserves, and here are the hives and dens of the squirrels that come down on the man's land and eat up his crops. If you really are in favor of conservation, if you mean to try and save the man's crop and put more bushels of grain in his bins, more vegetables, more corn, more potatoes, more cabbages, and everything else in his houses that are now destroyed by these squirrels, why do not you give some appropriation to the Department of Agriculture, to the Biological Survey, which has done so much good?

Now, some of these men that sign this petition which I have read I am personally acquainted with and have known for 30 years, and they are successful farmers in that country.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I want to ask two questions in connection with this matter. What percentage of the crops are destroyed?

Mr. RAKER. All the way from one-sixteenth to one-third in many places. In some places the crops have been entirely destroyed.

Mr. HOWARD. Can the gentleman give us the area of the country in which these crops are destroyed?

Mr. RAKER. It is almost unlimited—Nevada, California, Washington, Idaho, and Montana.

Mr. HOWARD. Are the squirrels good for human food?

Mr. RAKER. I have answered that question; they are not. Some people will eat almost anything, but I understand that the ordinary man will not eat squirrels.

Mr. HOWARD. I thought that we might conserve the meat product by killing them and eating them.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. What practical methods do they use to destroy them?

Mr. RAKER. The Biological Survey has had wonderful success in destroying them by poison. In some places they have eradicated them practically entirely.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not practical for the farmer to put poison on his land?

Mr. RAKER. The farmer kills the animals on his own land, but they come in from the forest reservation over which he has no control and destroy his crops.

Mr. WINGO. Can not he put poison on his own land?

Mr. RAKER. No; you want to put the poison in the squirrel holes and rat holes.

Mr. WINGO. Would not he eat it in the fields?

Mr. RAKER. He is too smart to pick it up when he can get green foliage. He will not eat dry poison when he can get green crops. The poison should be applied at the right time and place. The Biological Survey knows how to do that. Help them in this work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 2, after the word "diseases," insert the words "and animals."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment that it is not germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the Chair's voice was a little weak and I did not quite understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to have been heard on the point of order, but I realize now that it is too late.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, in the midst of this heated and interesting debate upon the bill providing for the distribution of agricultural products, and for other purposes, I desire to thank the distinguished chairman of the committee for granting to me the time necessary to bring to the Members of the House a message of good cheer, a message which is deserving of special mention at this particular time. I have the honor to represent in this Congress the nineteenth district of Pennsylvania, a district composed of the counties of Bedford, Blair, and Cambria. This country is now at war with the Imperial German Government, and in order to provide the funds necessary to carry on the war our people have been requested to subscribe for a bond issue in the enormous sum of $2,000,000,000. It has been repeatedly said that the people of the United States are not responding to the call as speedily as the administration anticipated, but I am happy to state that the county of Blair now occupies the seat of honor for the entire State of Pennsylvania, in that her people have taken upon themselves a pledge to invest in what is popularly called liberty bonds to the extent of $10,000,000. In this action they have shown, in a substantial way, their loyalty and patriotism and have rightfully earned the position in which they are placed by the executive chairman of the liberty loan committee. While many persons are talking and advocating war, the people of Blair County come forward, and in a commendable manner do their bit by a subscription for bonds surpassing any yet reported in the great State of Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask that there be read by the Clerk, in my time, an item appearing to-day in the columns of the Philadelphia North American.

The Clerk read as follows:

BLAIR'S $10,000,000 LEADS WHOLE STATE FOR LIBERTY BONDS—WORKERS IN COUNTY'S INDUSTRIAL PLANTS TO BUY THEM—BIG SPURT HERE FOR NATION'S WAR LOAN.

Blair County yesterday set the pace for all Pennsylvania in the liberty-loan campaign by pledging itself to take $10,000,000 worth of liberty bonds. Announcement to this effect was received by Walter C. Janney, executive chairman of the liberty-loan committee here, in a telegram from the committee in Blair County.

Details of how much each subscriber is to take were not given in this message. It was explained, however, that the big industrial plants of the county will take the entire amount and then distribute among their employees on the installment plan all the workmen may be willing and able to handle.

News of this subscription came at a time when the campaign was going at top-notch speed in this city, but it served to make the 3,000 bond salesmen redouble their efforts. When the headquarters of the committee closed last night it was estimated that 15,000 subscriptions had been obtained for liberty bonds.

Spurred by the action of Blair County, committees in every other district in the State for the sale of the liberty bonds got to work yesterday lining up merchants, manufacturers, bankers, capitalists, and working people to procure a maximum subscription.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] with a great deal of interest. What he had to say indicated that we have made a very grievous mistake during this session of Congress. Instead of conscripting men and sending them to the trenches of Europe, we should have conscripted them and sent them out into the State of California to fight prairie dogs and ground squirrels. Instead of conscripting men to send to the trenches of Europe with guns on their shoulders, we ought to send them out to California with guns on their shoulders and poison in their pockets to make a campaign against the ground squirrels and the prairie dogs in the national forests. We are only spending $265,000 a year for that purpose now.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman make any distinction between sending men out to destroy animals that destroy crops and sending men out to destroy little bugs and insects that destroy crops? Can the gentleman make any distinction?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think there is a great distinction.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to hear the gentleman make the distinction. One gentleman here suggests that one is a bug and the other is a squirrel.

Mr. ANDERSON. We are not sending men out to destroy bugs in the national forests.

Mr. MEEKER. You are not? You have a large appropriation of over $200,000 for sending men out to destroy bugs.

Mr. ANDERSON. We have a large appropriation to investigate diseases and insects. We do not send men out and pay them salaries to destroy the insects.

Mr. RAKER. That is exactly what you do.

Mr. ANDERSON. We do not.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. According to what the gentleman from California says, if we had conscripted the squirrels and sent them to Europe we would have settled the war. They would have eaten up everything.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. They would have reduced the food supply at any rate.

Mr. ANDERSON. There may be something in what the gentleman says. I am surprised that the gentleman from California, who is usually so alert in the interest of his constituents, should have overlooked the fact that his amendment was germane to the preceding section and did not offer it then instead of at a place where he should have known at least that it was not germane. I am surprised that the gentleman, usually so alert, should have been asleep at the switch, as he proved to be on this occasion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from California was alert enough to get 10 minutes on the wrong paragraph.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from California is usually alert enough to get 10 minutes when he is wrong.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was announced by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. Was the debate limited to this section or to this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has been limited to the paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. MONDELL. Was the section read as a section?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer as an amendment on line 2, page 6, after the word "of" to insert the word "rodents."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman from Wyoming that there is an amendment to the amendment now pending. He may offer his amendment later.

Mr. MONDELL. My amendment is, on page 6, line 2, after the words "eradication of," to insert the word "rodents."

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending to that paragraph now.

Mr. MONDELL. I simply offer my amendment that it may be pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that may be done.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment, and it will be considered pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL moves to amend page 6, line 2, after the words "eradication of," by inserting the word "rodents."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it has been well said at one time and another that truthful words are frequently spoken in jest. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is not ordinarily a jester, but it pleased him to speak in a jesting mood with regard to what the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] just said about the devastation by the ground squirrels in California. That is no joke, I will say to my friend from Minnesota. If it is true, as has been frequently said, that it is as important to furnish our allies with food as it is with men, I do not know but that it would be good governmental policy—if it is good governmental policy to draft men at all, which I doubt—to draft men for the eradication of prairie dogs and ground squirrels in this country. The American prairie dog, I estimated after a somewhat careful survey of the subject, which did not cost as much as the survey we are proposing in this bill, occupies somewhere from 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 acres of American soil, and in occupying it and securing his living he makes a desert of it. A prairie-dog town is always on land that produces grass, otherwise the prairie dog would not be there, because he could not make a living. He does not leave any grass for live stock. Estimating 10 acres for summer feed for a steer upon that area, if my mathematical calculation, hurriedly made, is correct, the prairie dogs of the country deprive about 2,500,000 steers of grazing land annually. The probability is that we could carry at least a million more cattle the year round than we do on the grazing lands of the West if the prairie dogs were all killed. We could perhaps carry 10,000,000 more sheep than we do if the prairie dogs were eradicated. The Department of Agriculture is doing very good work in the eradication of the prairie dogs.

I know of no governmental expenditure with which I am familiar that is more clearly and definitely and beyond question of real value. I believe every dollar the Government has spent in my State and in other States in the eradication of these harmful rodents has led to the expenditure of at least $20 by private individuals for every dollar that the Government has spent. The Government has, in cooperation with our people, cleaned up in my State vast areas, running into the millions of acres, of prairie-dog towns in the last few years. By so doing they have added just that much to our available grazing lands, as effectively as though we had newly created it. We bought some islands down in the south seas a short time ago, at some $300 an acre; but we made available right at home several million acres in the last year or two at the cost of a few cents an acre by the very simple process of killing off the rodents that have been consuming all the grasses that grow on those lands.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. HICKS. Has any effort been made to market these prairie dogs as a matter of food?

Mr. MONDELL. No man who lives in a prairie-dog country ever thinks of eating one, and would not want to offer them to anyone else.

Mr. HICKS. Why not?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman told me privately a moment ago that he knew they were very delicious; but you would have to have a campaign of education that would cost more than the appropriation in this bill in order to get the people in the prairie-dog country to believe they are good eating.

Mr. HICKS. I have eaten prairie dogs many times, and they are as fine a meat as I have ever eaten.

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps they are. I never tried them. I have heard people say that muskrats were good eating, but somehow in a muskrat country nobody eats them.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What do these prairie dogs feed on?

Mr. MONDELL. Prairie dogs feed on grass and roots; they are strict vegetarians. They keep the grass clipped down as fine as any lawn mower on earth could do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more, and that that be added to the time. I ask unanimous consent to add five minutes to the time already allotted.

Mr. LEVER. I trust the gentleman will not insist on that.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to my friend that I have not taken any time at all on his bill up to this moment. There have been several times that I was tempted to speak, but I wanted to help him get his bill along.

Mr. LEVER. The trouble with the gentleman is that he has been in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MONDELL. It is partly due to that fact, but this is an important and interesting matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. The prairie dog occupies the dry grazing lands of the intermountain West. He is a grass eater, and he keeps the grass for a considerable distance around his burrow constantly fed down. Formerly the devastation of the prairie dog was confined almost wholly to the eating of the grasses on the public domain, and by so doing reducing the grazing area on which was grown and fattened the great range herds and flocks, but in the last few years the prairie-dog country has been invaded by the settler and homesteader. They are now utilizing these lands for the growing of crops, and a grain crop planted on or beside a prairie-dog town is doomed unless the dogs are killed. The prairie dog begins to eat it as the grain comes up, and keep it perfectly trimmed down all the season.

I have considerable doubt about the benefits that will be derived from a large portion of the expenditure contemplated by this act, but I have no doubt as to the direct benefit that will be derived by the use of some of these funds in the eradication of rodents—prairie dogs and squirrels—from the public domain and the adjacent privately owned lands.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. What would be the rodential effect of your amendment? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. To increase the production of grain and reduce the price of bread, speaking seriously.

Now, fortunately, no amendment is needed to this section to authorize the use of a certain portion of these funds for the eradication of predatory wild animals, and money can be used as advantageously for that purpose as for the eradication of rodents. I saw somewhere an estimate that a good, stout gray wolf, within the conscription age, destroys about $1,300 worth of live stock per annum. A good husky coyote, our people estimate, will get away with anywhere from 20 to 50 sheep in a year. That is from $100 to $250 of toll that each one of those animals levies on the live stock of the country in a year. We are growing predatory wild animals in the forest reserves——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. Since the reserves have been created predatory wild animals have increased. It is necessary to consider the work of——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry I can not yield to my friend.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a very important question.

Mr. MONDELL. It is highly important that we should continue and increase the work of the eradication of these animals, which has been carried on for a number of years very successfully by the Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture. There is no use that can be made of the money appropriated in this bill which would be more helpful, more useful, or bring greater benefit or greater increase in live stock and in grain, than the use of moneys for the purpose I have suggested.

I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman uses a very comprehensive term when he uses the word "rodents" in his amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. It is all embracing, and that is why I used it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to ask the gentleman if the prairie dog maintained any social relations with the California squirrel? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Whether or not the prairie dog confines his sociability entirely to the owl and to the rattlesnake that occupy his den with him I do not know, but I have no doubt that when the prairie dog and the ground squirrel are found in the same locality they exchange calls and occupy the same hole. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the committee that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], dividing this lump appropriation, should be adopted. I trust that the other amendments may not be adopted. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offers an amendment. Did the gentleman from South Carolina withdraw his point of order to that?

Mr. LEVER. I ought not to have withdrawn the point of order, but I have done so. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MEEKER. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 50.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming demands tellers. The Chair will count. Gentlemen favoring the taking of the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend the remarks that I made a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others, $4,500,000.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 8, strike out "$4,500,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$4,348,400."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak as briefly as I can and still tell the House what I think it ought to know concerning the farm-demonstration work for which a large amount of money is to be appropriated.

Referring to the discussion of this bill when it was pending before the House several days ago, several gentlemen spoke of this work and evidenced such lack of information and indulged in so many misrepresentations—unintentionally, of course—concerning it that I feel justified in explaining it at some length. The work which it is proposed to supplement by this appropriation is carried on largely under what is known as the Lever Act, approved May 8, 1914. The bill which became law was introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

The value of farm-demonstration work, coming to the attention of agricultural colleges and the Department of Agriculture, led to the preparation of that bill. A number of years ago—just when, some gentlemen will remember better than I—the boll weevil made its appearance in the Southern States and devastated the cotton fields, and the Representatives of the South came to Congress and told of the devastation and asked for appropriations of money to assist them in combating the evil. The result was an appropriation, increased from time to time until the present.

That work was begun, as I remember, under Dr. S. A. Knapp, at one time president of the College of Agriculture of the State of Iowa, and it was carried on so well and so successfully that he actually saved the South from the awful loss that would have been involved in the total destruction of the cotton-growing industry and produced a situation which has led men living in and coming from that section to say that the boll weevil has in reality been a blessing to the South. Dr. Knapp carried on his work largely by interesting farmers, by engaging men as county agents, enlisting the services of those who were more than usually well informed to go out among the farmers to encourage and assist them in planting, cultivating, and marketing what we may call diversified crops, advising and inducing the planters in that section of the country to give up and get away from the one-crop idea. Dr. Knapp conducted that work until his death, only a few years ago, and the Representatives from the cotton-growing States will indorse what I say to the effect that the people in those States are still singing his praises.

I have read of meetings held from time to time in that section of the country to pass resolutions commending his work. Memorial services were held all over the South at the time of his death. During his life he was loved and respected by all the people of the South who knew of his splendid work in their behalf; by his intelligent effort agriculture of that part of the country was practically revolutionized; he did more for its agricultural interests than any other man who ever lived.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Dr. Knapp's work, involving all problems of agriculture, included as one of its important features, farm-demonstration work, as it was called. He was the pioneer and proved the inestimable value of that kind of work, the work which is so misunderstood in this House, and concerning which there has been so much criticism and so much misrepresentation. The first draft of the bill which finally became the Lever law, was prepared by the executive committee of the Association of Agricultural Colleges of the country. The first draft prepared was placed in my hands, and I introduced it in the Sixtieth Congress, but I failed to get a favorable report from the Committee on Agriculture upon it. At the next Congress a new and improved draft of the bill was introduced by the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. It passed the House in that Congress, but failed to pass the Senate. In the next Congress it passed both Houses and became a law. It provides $10,000 a year for each of the States for extension work. It provides $600,000 additional to be divided among the States the second year of the life of the law and each year following for seven years, provided an additional $500,000 above the appropriation of the previous year, until, at the end of seven years, when the law will mature, the total amount of the annual appropriation will be $4,580,000. Ten thousand dollars then goes to each State each year without condition, except that it is to be used for extension work. All appropriations, above the $10,000 per year to each State, are apportioned among the States according to, or in proportion to, their rural population, on the express condition that the legislature, the college, or some other public agency set forth in the law, shall make available an equal amount for expenditure each year, and on the further condition that the money shall be devoted to extension work, which, as you understand, includes this very important work of farm demonstration.

It has been frequently and vehemently said in this House, and it is sometimes said outside of Congress, that this law is unpopular; that it is not working well; that it is antagonized by the colleges and by prominent agricultural societies of the several States. Mr. Chairman, that statement is made in absolute ignorance of the operation and of the results of the law. The law has been approved by every State in the Union, and by positive, affirmative action each State has approved it and signified its willingness and its desire to operate under it, to make appropriations and come in line, so that the appropriations from the Federal Treasury—which I say are made to the States only on condition that equal amounts are provided for by the States—may be obtained by the States.

During the early days, before the Lever law placed farm demonstration on a sound and satisfactory basis, there was some objection to the work in the North, where occasional or scattered attempts were made to carry it on, but that objection was, as I learned, due solely to the fact that the agents were employed by the Department of Agriculture and sent into the States to work under the direction of the department, entirely independent of the agricultural colleges of the States and independent of any direction or control except that of the department by whom they were appointed and paid. Some of the men connected with agricultural colleges objected to men coming into their States and assisting and advising farmers without the consent of or independent of the colleges. There was a feeling of jealousy and some feeling of rivalry, I believe, between the colleges and the department, and that feeling was directed against the county agents who were sent into the State. But to-day, Mr. Chairman, this Lever law, by which these large amounts of money are paid to the States, is accepted and approved by every agricultural college in the country. It operates in this way: The money is paid to the agricultural colleges of the State directly, and each college annually presents to the Department of Agriculture its plan of operations, setting forth in detail the manner in which the money is to be spent; the department approves it, and the work is taken up and carried on by the county agents. In each State a State agent is employed on the recommendation of the agricultural college of the State and approved by the department, so the State agent, who directs the work of all county agents in the State, is the choice of the college itself; he directs all the extension work in the State. When an agent is employed in a county the department contributes $600 a year toward his salary, the agricultural colleges contributes $600, and the county, either through its board of supervisors or other governing authority, or, in many cases, by private contributions, contributes the rest of the money, in the aggregate on an average about $2,700 for a county; that is, $2,700 per year is the average of the salary and expenses of a county agent. This work can not be imposed upon any county. The college itself must approve the application of the counties for agents and contributes $600 for each agent, and the county supplies, on an average, $1,500 a year for its agent.

These agents are selected in this way: The State agent, having knowledge of men fitted for this kind of work, recommends to the county the names of several men whom he thinks are suited for the work. The county authorities call those men before them—one by one, I presume—and examine them until they find a man whom they think has the requisite knowledge and experience properly to take care of the work which he has to do. So there is no imposition upon a county. The county contributes most of the money. County authorities do it cheerfully, if they do it at all. They themselves select the man; if they are not satisfied with men offered them, they ask for others until a suitable and satisfactory man is found.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this item of $4,000,000 is for the extension of the Lever bill?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. A part of it, yes.

Mr. BORLAND. How much of it?

Mr. LEVER. Two items—$2,460,000 and $1,599,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Making in all how much?

Mr. LEVER. Making in all nearly $4,000,000.

Mr. BORLAND. I am in thorough accord with the purpose of the Lever Act. I have seen its operation. I think it is a good thing.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Just a question now. My time is limited.

Mr. BORLAND. But why should it be an emergency appropriation in this particular bill to extend that work?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Very soon after the declaration of war the Secretary of Agriculture called a conference of the agricultural men of the country, and they met in St. Louis. A conference of a similar nature was held in Berkeley, Cal., I believe. That was attended by representatives of 32 States who considered the needs of the situation and recommended a plan of work, and this extension of county-agent work was a prominent feature and strongly recommended. Dean Russel, of the University of Wisconsin, attended that conference. He came before our committee and told us that the work is successful in his State, is satisfactory, and ought to be extended as rapidly as possible. Dr. Thompson, the president of the State University of Ohio, spoke to the same effect. The president of the University of Iowa—the State of the gentleman, the ranking Republican member of this committee, the gentleman who has so viciously attacked this appropriation—came before the committee and told us that the work in that State was satisfactory and he wished the work continued. I will say that the Legislature of the State of Iowa in meeting appropriations made by the Federal Government has appropriated more money for this particular work during the last three years than any other State in the Union. [Applause.] There have also been more private contributions by the people of Iowa than in any other State. All of which shows conclusively that this demonstration is successful and popular in Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct the gentleman and say that the gentleman is not president of the University of Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If I may have five minutes more, there are other things I want to mention.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more, and I want to couple with that a request for five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes, and then I will ask that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I want five minutes to talk out of order on another matter that has just passed. I do not want to leave it unless you want to quit now, for I am going to have an opportunity to be heard at this time so that it will go in the RECORD before we adjourn. That is all there is to it.

Mr. LEVER. I think there will be no objection to that.

Mr. RAKER. I want five minutes to speak out of order.

Mr. LEVER. There will be no objection to giving the gentleman from California five minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the gentleman propose to try to get a vote on the bill to-night?

Mr. LEVER. No; I want a vote on all the amendments to this paragraph.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And the gentleman does not propose to read the whole bill through to-night?

Mr. LEVER. I do not. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Of that time I ask that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] may each have five minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman does not mean to close the reading of the bill to-night, I will take my time on Monday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa disputed my statement when I said that Dr. Pearson is president of the University of Iowa. The gentleman is right. Dr. Pearson is not president of the university; he is president of the Iowa State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts.

Now, as I said, the Lever law has been accepted by every State in the Union and, with three exceptions, every State has, year by year, made an appropriation necessary to bring itself within the law and avail itself of the appropriation coming under the Lever law from the Federal Treasury. I said with three exceptions, and one of those exceptions is Michigan. There the appropriation by the legislature to the agricultural college is so large and was practically made for the purpose of having the college use a part for cooperating under the Lever law that Michigan is not really an exception. The other two States are Rhode Island and Illinois. But in the latter State the work has been carried on extensively, the value is so well recognized, and is so generously approved that private subscriptions have been large enough to enable the State to avail itself of the money coming from the Lever law. In the States of the Union the money appropriated for this kind of work over and above the amount of money necessary to enable the States to avail themselves of the money coming under the Lever law for 1916 amounts to the enormous sum of $2,300,000. That shows that the States do approve this work and that they appreciate the value of it. I might quote from the testimony of gentlemen who appeared before us—Dr. Pearson, the president of the Agricultural College of Iowa, who, as I remember, calls these county agents the State's "minute men"; Dr. Russell, the dean of the agricultural faculty at the University of Wisconsin, who speaks in the highest terms of the work of these men; and Dr. Thompson, the president of the Ohio State University. Every one of these gentlemen approves the work, and if three better men ever appeared before that committee I have never seen them during my 10 years of service. I doubt if any better men ever appeared before any committee, and I think no one will doubt their judgment on this important matter. It is proposed to use some of this money in organizing and carrying on boys' clubs. In the South, where Dr. Knapp started the work, and where it is very ably carried on by his son, there are more than 100,000 boys who have been organized into clubs, and the girls' club organizations have a membership of more than 65,000. Women's agricultural clubs have been organized in 500 counties of the cotton States. As to whether or not those boys' clubs do any good, I would say that they are taught by the county agents how to grow corn better and produce more; and at one meeting of the Committee on Agriculture the president of the Agricultural College of the State of Georgia appeared, and among the things he said as a part of his hearty approval of the farm demonstration work, that the farmers of Georgia paid little attention at first to the work of the boys, but later, being impressed with the value of it, they took it up and applied it in their own work, and as a result, the doctor told us, speaking about two years ago, that the year before the farmers of Georgia, taking advantage of the advice that had been given to the boys by the farm agents, and following the methods pursued by the boys, had increased the value of the corn crop in Georgia $10,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall devote but a short time in discussing a question somewhat personal to my two colleagues, Mr. KINKAID and Mr. REAVIS, and myself.

We are engaged in a mighty international war. Some have their work laid out for them by the people. Others have theirs fixed by the Government. Apart for these there is a commendable sentiment among many to find a duty and do it.

It is somewhat regrettable that certain species of activity tolerated in time of peace should be selected as a duty now.

It is a time when truth and frankness should prevail and when libel and falsehood could well be spared.

My attention has recently been called to a letter written and addressed by Hon. C. F. McGrew, of Omaha, Nebr., to the Omaha Bee, Nebraska State Journal, the Nebraskan, and perhaps other papers, as the editorial comments of several have just come to my attention.

The clipping before me is as follows:

[From the Omaha Bee, May 14, 1917.]

HOW WOULD THE KAISER VOTE?

OMAHA, May 12.

To the EDITOR OF THE BEE:

When a Member of the American Congress is in doubt as to how he should vote on a pending measure it might be well for him to ask the question, "How would the Kaiser vote if he were a Member of this body?"

Had the Kaiser been a Member of Congress since the outbreak of the war the record would undoubtedly appear as follows:

Shall we stop the selling of war munitions to the allies? Kaiser Wilhelm votes "Yes."

Shall the armed neutrality bill pass? Kaiser Wilhelm votes "No."

Shall war be declared against Germany? Kaiser Wilhelm votes "No."

Shall Col. Roosevelt or some other fighting American who could raise a half million American volunteers in 10 days be permitted to lead them to France? Kaiser Wilhelm votes "No."

It is very much to be regretted that a number of Nebraska Representatives in Congress, including Senator NORRIS, Representatives SLOAN, KINKAID, and REAVIS, have at times been found voting as the Kaiser would vote, and it may be well for the voters of Nebraska to remember this when election day arrives.

The same rule might be used as guidance in smaller legislative bodies. If the Kaiser had been a member of the late Nebraska Legislature he would have voted against the repeal of the law requiring that German be taught in the public schools.

Were the Kaiser a citizen of Omaha, he would appear before the Omaha school board with a petition to continue the teaching of German in the Omaha graded schools during the present year in violation of the law.

If any citizen has any doubt as to his loyalty as an American, he should ask himself the question whether he stands with or against the Kaiser. No citizen of any country at war can remain neutral. He is either loyal to his country or he is a traitor, if not in action he is at least in thought. If he is elated when victory appears to be on the side of the Germans or not elated when the allies are winning, then he is not a true citizen of America.

Measure yourself up and decide on which side of the Atlantic you rightly belong.

C. F. MCGREW.

To couple the names of American Congressmen with the head of the nation with which our country is at war is a serious act which in the heat of passion might be palliated if any fact existed warranting the statement. But to deliberately write letters addressed to great newspapers so as to secure wide publication, when three out of four of the basic statements were known to be wickedly false, and the fourth a matter of legitimate debate, should meet the rebuke of all just men.

The first proposition, "Shall we stop the selling of war munitions to the allies? Kaiser Wilhelm votes 'Yes.'" As no such proposition was ever submitted to a vote of the House of Representatives, neither my colleagues, KINKAID or REAVIS, nor myself voted thereon.

Second. "Shall the armed neutrality bill pass? Kaiser Wilhelm votes 'No.'" That was before the House of Representatives and KINKAID, REAVIS, and SLOAN voted for it. Congressman REAVIS made the first speech in either House or Senate favoring armed neutrality. This was even before the President recommended it. We desired to eliminate every possible cause that might plunge this country into the world war in the form we now find the country.

Third. "Shall war be declared against Germany? Kaiser Wilhelm votes 'No.'" There were two propositions submitted and voted upon. Each declared that a state of war existed. The one submitted by myself provided for placing our country in a state of thorough defense. This the second proposition omitted. My resolution provided for use of the Army and Navy to protect and enforce our rights on land and sea, and especially within the submarine-blockade zone. My resolution provided for the use of the immediately available resources of the Government. The other pledged all the resources of the country, which meant the pledging, if thought proper by Congress, the full value of all the people's property through bonds or its seizure through taxation. More than 100 Members, including my two colleagues named and myself, voted for my resolution. On the vote upon the war resolution 50 Members, including myself and two colleagues named, voted against and 373 for. I am content to leave my vote to the judgment of my people and posterity. The form and scope of the war adopted by Congress is the one now binding on myself and the country, and must be pressed to a successful finish.

Fourth. "Shall Col. Roosevelt or some other fighting American, who could raise a half million American volunteers in 10 days, be permitted to lead them to France? Kaiser Wilhelm votes 'No.'" KINKAID, REAVIS, and SLOAN voted for the Roosevelt army resolution and supported the measure in every way and at every opportunity. Congressmen KINKAID and REAVIS both made speeches on the floor of the House in support of this proposition. I was grieved to learn that the President felt constrained to take the advice of British officials as well as our own officials and refused to send Roosevelt, whose inspiring presence in France would be worth 10,000 men.

To conduct a great war it is said all activities must be continued, all utilities used, and every energy enlisted. Each of the unselected draftsmen may choose his part. I regret to see the libel mill and the falsehood factory chosen by one who could better do a better work.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, what I am about to say will be painful to me. It grows out of an amendment that I offered a short time ago in regard to the destruction of rodents in the State of California. Unfortunately for the great intermountain States and the Pacific coast, neither upon the Democratic nor the Republican side is that great territory of over 17 States represented on this committee, and it is peculiarly unfortunate when a valid amendment comes before the House that a member of that committee should get upon the floor and practically state to the committee something as fact which he ought to know does not even exist. He talks about no money being expended in exterminating insects. He is a member of the committee and he voted, and he ought to know that upon the last appropriation bill, pages 22 to 25, there are appropriated $931,480 for the purpose of investigating insects affecting the citrus fruits and cereals, and for investigating insects affecting southern cotton fields and for investigating insects affecting forests $50,707. And then they stand upon the floor of the House against an amendment coming from a man from the Western States, when that entire territory has not had a member upon the committee to represent them, in behalf of an industry as strong and as great and as large as this, when millions of dollars' worth of property is being destroyed by the rodents and other animals upon the public domain, and tell the House that we are using no men for this service. When he reads his own bill he will find that there are 100 employees in the city of Washington, saying nothing about the other employees scattered over the United States. And he tries to create laughter in order to beat an amendment that will actually save the food products of this country, that will enable us to add more and more to our wheat and our corn and barley and other products. But I imagine that many of the Members of the House thought the statement of the gentleman was correct when he said that we were not spending any money for the destroying of insects, when, as a matter of fact, on the last appropriation bill there is $950,000 appropriated for that purpose. I am surprised at my friend from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. The "gentleman from Minnesota" did not say there was no money spent for investigating insects.

Mr. RAKER. Or no men employed?

Mr. ANDERSON. For investigating insects?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I said there were men employed. I said there was no money spent for destroying insects by the Government.

Mr. RAKER. Can anybody conceive such an idea, when we are spending $900,000 for the very purpose of destroying insects? He was trying to beat a valid amendment, when there are 17 States—Pacific and intermountain States—with not a representative on the committee. I am disappointed that my friend should take that unfair advantage against the Pacific coast and intermountain States and deprive those farmers of the right of the protection of this Government, and not protect their property the same as you would protect it in other places. Here is an item for the investigation of insects affecting tropical and subtropical fruits. Here is an investigation affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, and so forth, $89,000. Of course, you do not destroy the boll weevil, do you? You just send a man around to look at him.

A MEMBER. Chain him.

Mr. RAKER. Chain him; yes. But when ground hogs and squirrels get on the farmer's land and eat up his crop there is nothing wrong about that. You send a man to inspect a boll weevil, but not to destroy him at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a committee amendment pending.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my amendment be read, then.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina will be read.

Mr. MANN. Is this an amendment to the paragraph?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. To the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: Strike out, on page 6, line 5, the language beginning with the word "and," down to and including the word "others," in line 8, and insert the following:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is empowered, whenever he shall find that there is or shall be a special need in any restricted area for nitrate of soda for the production of food or feed crops, to purchase such nitrate of soda, store it, and sell it to farmers at cost, including transportation and all other expenses, such cost price to be payable in advance. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal a supply of nitrate of soda to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture in such quantities, at such times, and at such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable. Upon failure of the person to comply with such requirement the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to requisition and take possession of such nitrate of soda and pay for it at the price so determined. If the price so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid for such nitrate of soda on delivery the amount prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation for such nitrate of soda, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies. Any moneys received by the United States from the sale of nitrate of soda to farmers under this section may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts For carrying out the purposes of this section, $4,500,000."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment. It is not germane to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order that it is not germane to the section.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Now, Mr. Chairman, I contend that this amendment is germane to this section. When I offered it this morning as a new section the question arose as to whether or not it was germane to any part of this bill. I then suggested that under this paragraph it was germane.

If the first part of my amendment should prevail, to strike out all after the word "production" down to and including the word "others," this paragraph would then read, "For increasing food production, $4,500,000." Under that power the Secretary of Agriculture could use that $4,500,000 in any way that he saw fit to increase the food production. He might do it in any one of a hundred different ways.

Now, is it not germane to that to suggest, by way of an amendment, the method by which he shall increase food production in the expenditure of that sum of $4,500,000? The proposition to increase food production by educational methods is simply stricken from the paragraph, and substituted for it is the proposition to increase food production by the use of nitrate of soda.

I submit that it is germane and that no valid argument can be made to the contrary.

Mr. ANDERSON rose.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order, but I will get recognition after the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Virginia shall be heard on it now.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] stated the grounds on which this amendment is in order. I agree with him entirely that it is in order. I would like to hear what arguments the gentleman from Minnesota may have, showing that it is not in order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, if the theory of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is correct, it will be in order on this bill to strike out everything after the enacting clause and to raise an army of 5,000,000 men. His theory seems to be that by striking out a portion of the bill he can insert an amendment which is apparently germane to the part that still remains. I submit that no such parliamentary doctrine is tenable.

But, Mr. Chairman, this section provides for increasing food production and eliminating waste by promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods. When the gentleman from South Carolina proposes an amendment which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to condemn nitrate of soda, to permit a suit to be brought against the United States to recover a sum which will be reasonable compensation for the property so taken, I submit that under no theory of parliamentary law can it be in order to such a section as this to provide for a suit against the United States to obtain compensation for property taken under a condemnation proceeding.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the language of the paragraph is—

> For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others, $4,500,000.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] proposes to strike out the essential item in this paragraph, which is "by educational and demonstrational methods" and to insert something in place of it. I wonder that the gentleman from South Carolina did not propose an amendment striking out all after the word "for." If the gentleman's theory is correct, that he can change what is germane to the paragraph by striking out all but a portion of it and then change the purpose of the paragraph, he could equally well have proposed an amendment striking out all after the word "for," or, on his theory, he could have stricken out all before the words "$4,500,000" and inserted an item, and then after that he could have changed the amount. The paragraph is for certain things by educational and demonstrational methods, and no amendment is germane which does not relate to that essential feature of the paragraph.

Of course, that part of the gentleman's amendment which authorizes suits against the Government is clearly not in order. But the whole amendment, even if that were eliminated, is not germane to this paragraph. If the Chair should hold that you can change the purpose of the paragraph by eliminating part of the language, you could strike out all but the word "a," if there were a word "a" here, and all before "an" and insert something before the word "an."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have followed closely the arguments of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], in support of the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina. The ground taken by these gentlemen is not tenable. This is no freak amendment, but is entirely in order according to the accepted principles of germaneness that prevail in this body.

I agree entirely with the gentleman from Illinois that it is not in order to strike from a bill all the language of a paragraph, and then insert matter not germane to the bill, or any section of the same. If all of the language of this paragraph was stricken out, the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina would not be in order, for the simple reason that there would be no subject matter in the bill to which the amendment could be related. There would be no subject matter to which the amendment would be germane. Nor could you strike out all the words of this paragraph following the word "for," and then argue that the pending amendment, or any other amendment for that matter, would be germane to the subject matter of the paragraph. Strike out all of the words of the paragraph, but the word "For," and this residuum would be meaningless. The proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina is an intelligible proposition, but it is not claimed on its behalf that it would be germane to the single and disconnected word "For."

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would not contend that the amendment would be germane if a certain portion of the paragraph were not stricken out?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, does the gentleman contend that you can strike out a portion of the paragraph which if retained would render the amendment out of order, and get that out of the way, and thus make the amendment germane?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is my contention. That is precisely the proposition that I am undertaking to present.

It is always in order to strike out any portion of a paragraph under consideration. If you strike out the language suggested by the Chair, that action will leave an intelligible residuum. Is it not competent for the committee to take that action? Is it not in accord with familiar principles of parliamentary law to strike out the language to which the Chair directed my attention?

Suppose that is done, what is left? An unintelligible sentence, a meaningless jumble of words? Not at all. On the contrary, the language left in the paragraph affords a very large and definite grant of power to the Secretary of Agriculture, to do anything and everything within the limits of the appropriation, that in his discretion will increase food production. Strike out the language indicated by the gentleman from South Carolina and the paragraph will read as follows:

> For increasing food production, $4,500,000.

Suppose the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] had reported his bill in that form, would anyone contend that the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] would not be in order? This amendment proposes a very rational plan to increase food production, and would certainly be germane to a paragraph affording a large appropriation to be applied in the discretion of the Secretary to one or many methods of increasing the food supply of the country. Further it is a part of the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, to reduce, by elimination, the paragraph under consideration to a general grant of power to the Secretary of Agriculture. The language, "For increasing food production, $4,500,000," which is all that will be left of this paragraph, if the motion to strike out prevails would empower the Secretary to use any available means to the above end, leaving the determination of those means to the discretion of this official.

The only limitation upon the extent of his operations, would be the amount of the appropriation. Within the limits of that appropriation the widest latitude would be afforded to try out, and apply plans, and materials for increasing food production. Afford this power to the Secretary of Agriculture and who would contend that an amendment directing the Secretary to furnish free seeds, and free fertilizer to the farmers who would use them under an agreed plan, would be out of order? But if such an amendment would be in order, in the event the bill had been reported in the form suggested, why would it not be in order if by appropriate parliamentary motions the bill is reduced to that form? Instead of combining the motion to strike out, and insert, the gentleman from South Carolina could first move to strike out the language suggested, thereby reducing the paragraph to the form: "For increasing food production $4,500,000," in the event the motion prevailed, and then offer his amendment to the paragraph in the new, and abridged form. This residuum would be subject matter in the bill, and as such could be amended by a germane amendment. Subject matter in a bill may be either subject matter, as originally reported, or subject matter remaining after the original matter has been subjected to the processes of amendment. This paragraph might be amended by the addition of new matter without objection, that would make the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina in order, or it may be amended by the excision of existing matter, as is proposed, so as to leave an intelligible residuum which would be subject matter of the bill, and therefore open to germane amendment. Now the gentleman from South Carolina has embodied the two motions in one, as he had a right to do. In substance he first moves to strike out the language to which I called the attention of the Chair, and then in lieu of that language offers other language which is germane to the paragraph in its new form.

The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina directs the Secretary of Agriculture, for the purpose of increasing food production, to use one of the means which it would be competent for the Secretary of Agriculture to use if he was clothed with the general power to stimulate this production. In terms the amendment directs the Secretary of Agriculture, for the purpose of increasing food production, to secure nitrates and furnish them to the farmers, for the purpose of increasing the yield of the food-producing areas.

Will not this action increase food production? Strike out the language proposed and the amendment will be directly related to what is left, and therefore germane. I followed the ruling of the Chair this morning when the Chair ruled out this amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina when it was first offered. The ruling of the Chair at that time was perfectly correct. It was in accord with reason and justified by precedent. If the gentleman from South Carolina, without making his motion to strike out, should offer his amendment to the paragraph in question as contained in the bill, it would fall within the principles announced by the Chair, and be out of order. But this is an entirely different situation, and the same principles which made the amendment out of order when first submitted now serve to make it in order. The combined proposition in the motion to strike out and insert first proposes to strike out certain language. Unless that is done by the affirmative vote of the committee, the proposition to insert does not come into operation, since the insertion is to follow the excision. But when the excision takes place, reducing the paragraph to the words "for increasing food production, $4,500,000," then the material proposed to be inserted is germane to this subject matter, and to the avowed purpose of the bill. I submit therefore that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina is in order.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. May I ask one question with reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the right conferred by the amendment to sue in the United States court? That language is the identical language. In fact, the whole amendment is identical with section 4 of this bill. It is the exact language and certainly is nothing but mere details of the method provided by which the Secretary can increase food production.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, paragraph 7 of Rule XVI is so plain—

> And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

That was what this rule was adopted for. They used to hold that you could make any change in the proposition under consideration—introduce new matters—but this rule is the rule of the House and in effect. Now, no one will contend that the subject matter under consideration in the bill is for anything except doing things by educational and demonstrational methods. That is the subject matter under consideration, and the express written rule of the House forbids a change under color of amendment by introducing a different proposition.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the rule cited by the gentleman from Illinois is the rule upon which I stand. It is the rule upon which I base my argument. I concede that if the language is not stricken out, the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina would not be in order. But after it is stricken out, then what is left in the bill is the subject matter of the bill, and may be amended by a germane amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is not directed to a paragraph containing the language cited by the gentleman from Illinois. So long as that language remains in the paragraph the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina would not be in order. But this amendment is proposed to a paragraph from which this language will be stricken out, if the motion to strike out prevails. And when that motion prevails, the amendment will be in order to the subject matter then remaining. It has been asked if an amendment would be in order to furnish farmers with free lands to cultivate, or to supply free teams for agricultural purposes. Not at all, so long as the bill is in its present form. But if the committee had reported this paragraph in the following form, "For increasing food production, $4,500,000," it would have been competent under that authority for the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish lands to parties agreeing to cultivate them, or teams to farmers without teams. Hence an amendment to either effect, in the event the bill had been reported in the form suggested, would be in order. Further if the paragraph under consideration is reduced to this form by the use of the motion to strike out, the above amendments, or the amendment of the gentlemen from South Carolina is in order. It is for the House to determine by its affirmative action on the motion to strike out whether it will reduce the paragraph in the bill to the form which will make the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina in order. While the gentleman subjects as one motion the motion to strike out and insert, a favorable vote of the committee on that motion would in substance amount first to striking out the language suggested, thereby making in order the language which the action of the House would next insert.

Mr. MANN. It is sufficient to say that the language has not been stricken out.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is a part of the motion. When that is done, the matter to be inserted is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] offers an amendment to which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] makes a point of order. The Chair has before him the rule to which attention has been called. It is in this language:

> No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

This paragraph sought to be amended reads as follows:

> For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others—

And so forth.

The gentleman's amendment provides for the Government buying nitrate of soda and selling to the farmers, and so forth, and argues that it is in order for the reason that such action would tend to increase food production. Clearly the food production provided for in this paragraph is in a specific way, and that is by "educational and demonstrational methods." The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] fair, as he always is, admits that unless certain language now in the paragraph is stricken out the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] would not be in order, but contends that the language now in the paragraph which stands in the way of the amendment, in the face of a point of order, can be stricken out and the other language contained in the amendment inserted at the same time. The Chair does not think that this can be done. In the face of a point of order the affirmative matter contained in the amendment offered can not even be considered. You can not do by indirection that which can not be done directly. A motion to strike out certain language in the bill would, of course, be in order, but the very fact that that motion has coupled with it matter which is not in order renders the whole amendment out of order. If this amendment is in order, you could amend the bill by providing for the purchase of a million acres of land to be given to the farmers of the country to encourage food production. The Chair thinks this is clearly out of order and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The motion to strike out would be in order, and if that motion was made and sustained the Chair would hold in order the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cross that bridge when he gets to it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the word "production," in line 5, page 6, down to the word "others," in line 8, page 6, and I announce that if that is adopted I will move to amend by inserting the language I have referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 6, line 5, strike out all after the word "production" down to and including the word "others" in line 8.

Mr. LEVER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. How much time has been taken up of the time allotted for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. There are 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. LEVER. And the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is pending. The debate has been limited to this paragraph and all amendments thereto, and 20 minutes of that time remain.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 28, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou are the creator and also the preserver of Thy universe. Peace and harmony and justice are the products of Thy law. We have sinned and come short of Thy glory. We turn to Thee for Thy forgiveness and for Thy blessing. Where we can not see the way we ask Thy guidance. In all that we do we pray that we may act with open vision, looking to the establishment of a fuller life and nobler brotherhood of men and nations, to the honor and glory of Thy name. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, May 25, 1917, was read and approved.

WORK OF THE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement made by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] as to the work that has been accomplished by Congress in the present session. It is a very important statement, and I think it ought to be placed in the permanent RECORD for reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

GREAT RECORD OF ACHIEVEMENT IS CONGRESS'S WAR LEGISLATION, SENATOR MARTIN TELLS CRITICS—CALLS UNFAIR IMPATIENCE OF MEN TO PLACE COUNTRY ON A WAR BASIS AT EARLIEST POSSIBLE MOMENT—GRIST OF MOMENTOUS LAWS ENACTED DETAILED—WAR RESOLUTION IN FOUR DAYS—DRAFT ACT—HUGEST REVENUE BILL—PROMISE THAT NEXT 45 DAYS WILL BE AS BUSY AT CAPITOL AS 45 DAYS BEHIND.

Senator MARTIN, majority leader in the Senate, has issued a statement in reply to criticism that Congress has been unnecessarily slow in enacting war legislation. He shows that, on the contrary, within the short time the session has proceeded the progress has been unusually rapid when the magnitude of the measures submitted is considered. Senator MARTIN'S statement follows:

"The present extraordinary session of Congress has been marked by a greater volume of legislation and the enactment of measures of more momentous import than have ever been considered in any similar period in the parliamentary history of the country. The criticism, therefore, that has been leveled at the House and Senate, growing out of the impatience to place the country upon a war basis at the earliest possible moment, in my judgment, is unfair and indicates a lack of appreciation or knowledge of the enormous amount of work which the two Houses of Congress have performed.

HARDLY TAKE TIME TO SLEEP.

"From April 2 to May 23 there were exactly 45 working days, and the membership of this Congress has scarcely taken time to eat or sleep because of the responsibilities which the war has imposed upon them. It must be remembered that it was a new Congress that met in response to the call of the President, and that at the very outset it was confronted with the necessity of organization, a process ordinarily requiring time and involving many contests. In the present instance, however, the committees of both Houses were named on April 3, the work of selecting them having been done during the vacation period.

"At the special session of the Senate, immediately preceding the extra session of Congress, there was passed a modified cloture rule under which public business might be expedited. The adoption of such a rule was accomplished within a few days after its introduction, a result that could not have been attained in any other period of our history short of months of debate, if at all.

NO DELAY IN WAR RESOLUTION.

"On April 2 the German war resolution was introduced in the House, and on April 6, or four days after the assembling of Congress, the President attached his signature to that measure. Certainly no delay was involved in the passage of this resolution, perhaps the most important ever offered, whether in this or any other Congress.

"Since that time Congress has considered and passed appropriation bills of enormous magnitude for the conduct of the war. It has authorized the greatest bond issue ever brought forward by any Government at a given time and has proceeded far toward the enactment of other measures considered necessary to equip the Government for active participation in the war. A brief survey of the action so far taken might be enlightening. Bills have passed as follows:

APPROPRIATION BILLS PASSED.

"1. Sundry civil appropriation bill, carrying a total of $156,293,031.17.

"2. Army appropriation bill, carrying $273,046,322.50, and the Military Academy appropriation bill, carrying $1,345,496.18.

"3. General deficiency appropriation bill, carrying in all $163,841,400.52.

"4. General Army and Navy deficiency appropriation bill, carrying, as it left the Senate, $3,342,404,131.22, the greatest single appropriation budget of this or any other Government. Of this sum $400,000,000 was actually appropriated for the establishment of a great merchant fleet for war purposes, and the expenditure of an additional $350,000,000 for the same purpose was authorized.

"5. A bill authorizing a bond issue of $7,000,000,000 'for the national security and defense.'

MADE DRAFT BILL A LAW.

"6. An act to authorize the President to increase the Military Establishment by selective draft to 1,000,000 men and to increase the strength of the Regular Army to 300,000 men and that of the National Guard to approximately 330,000 men.

"7. A joint resolution authorizing the President to take over for the United States the German interned ships in American ports.

"8. A bill to temporarily increase the commissioned, warrant, and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps from 87,000 to 150,000 men, in the first instance, and from 17,400 to 30,000 in the second.

"9. A bill to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, neutrality, and foreign commerce, generally known as the 'espionage' bill.

"Bills have also been passed making important amendments to the reserve-bank law and to the interstate-commerce law, the latter giving the Interstate Commerce Commission two additional members and the control of freight-car distribution.

WAR-REVENUE BILL IN HOUSE.

"It should also be noted that the House of Representatives has passed a very comprehensive and far-reaching bill for the purpose of raising the revenue necessary for carrying on the war. That bill has been sent over to the Senate, where the Senate Committee on Finance has given a great deal of attention to it, and will soon be ready to report it to the Senate for consideration.

"This summary does not take into account the great amount of preliminary work in connection with pending legislation. For instance, at this session the Senate committees have made 67 reports on bills and resolutions, and those of the House have made 50 reports. The Senate, moreover, has passed every bill which it has received from the House.

FORTY-FIVE DAYS AHEAD TO BE AS PROLIFIC.

"This record of achievement speaks for itself. Congress owes it to the country to carefully consider every piece of legislation which is offered, whether it be important or not. Notwithstanding this, the past 45 days have been crowded with action of far-reaching importance, and the next 45 days will probably find as much more work behind us. The foundation already has been laid for the passage of the remaining measures on the war program."

THE BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting a copy of a report on the beet-sugar industry in the United States bearing date May 24, 1917, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

MANUFACTURE OF DRUGS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the closing of the morning business I desire to say a few words with respect to Senate bill 2363, which I introduced on Saturday, and which now lies on the table.

It is the purpose of this bill to give to the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy the right to contract for the manufacture of drugs, medicines, remedies, or patent devices which may be protected by patent or trade-mark when in their judgment it is necessary for the health either of the Army or the Navy or of the public at large.

My belief is that either the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy now has this power; but it occurred to me if this bill, or some measure akin to it, is passed, it would help very materially to solve some of the difficulties which now confront the American people.

When I prepared the bill I had especially in mind the manufacture of a drug know as salvarsan. It is protected by German patent and trade-mark. It has at times been manufactured in this country. At present it is impossible to get the drug from Germany, and the men who own the patent in the United States have advanced the price of this drug so that it is next to impossible for a patient or a physician who desires to administer the drug to get it at a reasonable price. At the present time the drug is sold at $4.50 per dose, when it can be manufactured and sold at a reasonable profit at 25 cents per dose.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to an article which was published in the Journal of the American Medical Association for April 21, and which appears on page 1203. It is signed by Dr. J. W. Vanderslice, Dr. J. H. Walsh, and Dr. W. A. Pusey, of the Chicago Medical Society. I wish to read only two or three paragraphs showing the extent to which the public and the medical profession are victimized by those who are now controlling this drug. They say, in part:

Now is the best opportunity we shall ever have to get rid of these patents. Our experience with salvarsan during the last two years has been almost intolerable. Salvarsan and its related products during this time have been obtainable only through the grace of one man, Mr. H. A. Metz, in New York City. The drug is covered, we understand, by all the protective privileges that can possibly be used in caring for the pecuniary interests of those owning proprietary remedies. The name is copyrighted, the drug itself is a patented product, and the processes of its manufacture are patented. Under these patents the German owners and their American representative have made millions from the sale of the drug in America.

Although the facts are familiar to most physicians, it may be worth while to review the situation in regard to this drug that has developed during the war: First, Mr. Metz used his supply and what he could obtain from Germany in such manner as he saw fit. He distributed the drug to physicians, giving them such amounts as he thought they should have and limiting them in any way he pleased. We are not saying that he did not act wisely and in the best way he knew how or with public spirit, but at best he was a public-spirited and wise autocrat, dictating to the whole body of men who have the sickness of 100,000,000 people in their charge as to the supply of a drug that is at times essential.

Then omitting a portion of the article it reads:

Next, when he was no longer able to supply the drug himself, he allowed the Dermatological Research Laboratory of Philadelphia to make it under an agreement by which he could stop their manufacture of it immediately whenever he saw fit. That laboratory, it may be said in passing, is not organized for profit, and their large profits from the manufacture of salvarsan during a short period have been dedicated to research in medicine. That institution, it may also be said, made a salvarsan which, in the opinion of some competent men, was less toxic than the commercial product from Germany. Finally when the Deutschland succeeded in getting over here and brought a new supply of salvarsan, Mr. Metz immediately stopped the distribution of the Philadelphia salvarsan, and for the last several months we have been compelled to rely, as far as salvarsan is concerned, on such supplies as he has seen fit to furnish us. Sometimes he has furnished it; sometimes he has not. It rests with him whether or not a physician gets a supply; and your patient or mine can get the salvarsan he needs or not, according to Mr. Metz's decision. The situation is as though the supply of quinine for this country was absolutely in one man's hands.

Recently Mr. Metz has seen fit to send out a circular letter to the profession, in which he makes the explicit threat of exacting legal penalty from those who use any substitute for the patented article—this in spite of the fact that the new supply of salvarsan received from Germany, according to published reports by competent, disinterested men, has proved less free from danger than the salvarsan we got from Germany before the war or the salvarsan made in Philadelphia. In the same letter Mr. Metz informs us that he is going to try to make it in this country pretty soon. He is going to furnish it at the old price—a price which represents millions of dollars of profit annually from the American sale of the drug. Whether he is going to succeed or not in making a satisfactory article nobody knows; but we do know that if it were not for rights that rest in Germany, and do not belong to Mr. Metz except through German title, we have persons in this country who could make a first-class salvarsan and who would be glad to sell it at from one-third to one-fourth the price that Mr. Metz wants for it and that we have been made to pay for it heretofore.

The question may well be raised of the moral right of profiting to the extent of great fortunes from patents on drugs of necessity to the sick. Certainly it is abhorrent to the ethics of the medical profession. But even if there be nothing wrong in this, it may be said in the case of salvarsan that the drug has already yielded profits amounting to millions of dollars, and every one interested in the ownership of the drug has already been well provided for. This doubtless applies to the Ehrlich family, and there is every reason to believe that his agency for the drug in this country has added greatly to Mr. Metz's large wealth; so that no injustice would be done anyone by abolishing these patents and giving the sick for the future the benefit of the reduction in price and providing assurance against further failure in supply of the drug.

Mr. President, I have several letters here, one from Dr. F. E. Bunts, of Cleveland, Ohio, another from Dr. J. M. T. Finney and Dr. George Walker, of Baltimore, Md., and resolutions from the secretary of the Columbus (Ohio) Medical Society, which I ask permission to insert in the RECORD without reading.

The letters referred to are as follows:

CLEVELAND, May 22, 1917.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am taking the liberty of writing you in hopes that you may see your way clear to assist in enacting legislation for the abrogation of patents on salvarsan, a proprietary German remedy. Should we be able to make it in this country, the price will probably be reduced from $4.50 per dose of 6 decigrams to 50 cents or less. The use of it has become so important and so established in this country that it is probable that municipalities will take up the administration of it in many institutions, and it is extremely desirable that the price should be made low enough to permit its general use.

Respectfully,

F. E. BUNTS.

BALTIMORE, May 15, 1917.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
The Highlands, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We write to ask you if you could devise some means by which the patent rights on the drug salvarsan, or 606, a medicine used for the cure of syphilis, could be abrogated or the conditions so changed that the cost would be materially lessened. The reasons for this request are as follows:

Syphilis is very widespread among the whole population, and especially so among the poorer classes, where it is found to the extent of from 10 per cent to 15 per cent; among the criminal classes it ranges from 20 per cent to 30 per cent; in some hospitals for the insane examinations have shown it to be as high as 22 per cent. In the negro population of cities it is over 20 per cent. It is now recognized to be the sole cause of locomotor ataxia, general paresis, and certain forms of paralysis and aneurism. It enters as a very decided factor in diseases of the blood vessels, of bones, and the brain and nervous system. It is an important predisposing cause in cancer of the tongue and of the rectum; it forms a basis of certain diseases of the heart and aorta; and it renders the human system less resistant to many other maladies.

Salvarsan is of the greatest possible value in the treatment of syphilis; it is about thirty times more efficacious than the usual remedies (mercury and iodide of potash); one dose is about as effective as one month's administration of mercury; and there are many instances where one or two doses have produced complete cures when given in the very early stages.

You can readily appreciate, therefore, the great benefit to the people of this country and to the soldiers of the Army if this drug could be obtained at a price within the reach of those who so urgently need it. There are now about 8,000,000 syphilitics in the United States, the majority of whom can not procure the medicine.

The patent on this drug is held by a large German dye company of Frankfort, Germany. It is protected in a most comprehensive way by over 30 grants, so that it is impossible for it to be made in this country without infringement. The price at the present time for one dose of 6 decigrams, or about 9 grains, is $4.50. This can be manufactured by our chemists at an estimated cost ranging from 14 to 35 cents. One firm who has made it promises to put it on the market after a short while at 50 cents. If we estimate the cost of production at 25 cents and the selling price by the German concern at $4.50, one sees that there is a profit of 1,700 per cent.

There are about 3,000 doses used in a day in the United States. Would it not appear, therefore, that during the five years in which the German manufacturers have owned the patents that they have made enough, and that it is now time for the syphilitics of our country to come in for their share and to have the drug put at a price within their reach? Here is a case where the welfare of humanity is interfered with and the restoration to health of a large number of people prevented by a technical law which denies them their fundamental rights and enables a German firm to exact millions of undeserved profit.

We sincerely trust that you will give this matter your earnest consideration, as it is a subject of most serious and far-reaching significance to this Nation. We are,

Very truly,

J. M. T. FINNEY.
GEO. WALKER.

THE GENERAL PRACTITIONERS' MEDICAL SOCIETY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
COLUMBUS, OHIO.

Resolution passed at meeting, May 10, 1917.

Whereas salvarsan and neosalvarsan are of vital importance in the treatment of syphilis and other diseases; and

Whereas salvarsan and neosalvarsan are not obtainable by reason of German patents and the war; and

Whereas salvarsan and neosalvarsan can be made in the United States of America for 400 per cent less than the German patent agents have formerly charged us: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Practitioners' Medical Society, of Columbus, Ohio, That Congress be earnestly requested to immediately abrogate the patents on salvarsan and neosalvarsan.

G. W. KEIL, M. D., Secretary.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to call attention especially to one paragraph in the letter of Dr. Finney and Dr. Walker, in which they say:

The patent on this drug is held by a large German dye company of Frankfort, Germany. It is protected in a most comprehensive way by over 30 grants, so that it is impossible for it to be made in this country without infringement. The price at the present time for one dose of 6 decigrams, or about 9 grains, is $4.50. This can be manufactured by our chemists at an estimated cost ranging from 14 to 35 cents. One firm who has made it promises to put it on the market after a short while at 50 cents. If we estimate the cost of production at 25 cents and the selling price by the German concern at $4.50, one sees that there is a profit of 1,700 per cent.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a minute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say to the Senator that some two or three weeks ago at the instance of Dr. Mayo, of Rochester, Minn., and his staff, who called my attention to this matter, I introduced a bill on the subject and it was referred to the Committee on Patents. I gave the letter from the Mayo staff to the chairman of that committee. There is a bill pending before the Committee on Patents upon the subject.

Mr. POMERENE. I was not aware of the fact that the Senator had introduced the bill. I had seen the letters from the Drs. Mayo and know fully their position on the subject.

There is a statute now on our statute books, which was passed June 25, 1910, and is found in Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 851, which it seems to me gives to the Government the power to manufacture these articles and leaves the patentee, if he has been injured thereby, to the Court of Claims to assert his claim for damages. But I believe that under the present conditions it might be well to have either the War Department or the Navy Department instructed to begin the manufacture of this drug for the protection of the health of the Army and the Navy and the public.

In order that Senators may be advised as to the legal phase of the question I desire to call attention to the case of Crozier against Krupp, in Two hundred and twenty-fourth United States Reports, page 290, and ask, without taking the time of the Senate, that the paragraph beginning on page 304 and ending on page 305 be printed in the RECORD, and also the syllabus in the case of the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Co. of America against Simon, in Two hundred and twenty-seventh Federal Reporter, page 906. This latter case was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals and their decision will be found in Federal Reporter, Two hundred and thirty-first, page 1021.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

In other words, the situation prior to the passage of the act of 1910 was this: Where it was asserted that an officer of the Government had infringed a patent right belonging to another—in other words, had taken his property for the benefit of the Government—the power to sue the United States for redress did not obtain unless from the proof it was established that a contract to pay could be implied; that is to say, that no right of action existed against the United States for a mere act of wrongdoing by its officers. Evidently inspired by the injustice of this rule as applied to rights of the character of those embraced by patents, because of the frequent possibility of their infringement by the acts of officers under circumstances which would not justify the implication of a contract, the intention of the statute to create a remedy for this condition is illustrated by the declaration in the title that the statute was enacted "to provide additional protection for owners of patents." To secure this end, in comprehensive terms the statute provides that whenever an invention described in and covered by a patent of the United States "shall hereafter be used by the United States without license of the owner thereof or lawful right to use the same, such owner may recover reasonable compensation for such use by suit in the Court of Claims"; that is to say, it adds to the right to sue the United States in the Court of Claims already conferred when contract relations exist the right to sue even although no element of contract is present. And to render the power thus conferred efficacious the statute endows any owner of a patent with the right to establish contradictorily with the United States the truth of his belief that his rights have been in whole or in part appropriated by an officer of the United States, and if he does so establish such appropriation that the United States shall be considered as having ratified the act of the officer and be treated as responsible pecuniarily for the consequences. These results of the statute are the obvious consequences of the power which it confers upon the patentee to seek redress in the Court of Claims for any injury which he asserts may have been inflicted upon him by the unwarranted use of his patented invention and the nature and character of the defenses which the statute prescribes may be made by the United States to such an action when brought. The adoption by the United States of the wrongful act of an officer is, of course, an adoption of the act when and as committed, and causes such act of the officer to be, in virtue of the statute, a rightful appropriation by the Government, for which compensation is provided. In substance, therefore, in this case, in view of the public nature of the subjects with which the patents in question are concerned and the undoubted authority of the United States as to such subjects to exert the power of eminent domain, the statute, looking at the substance of things, provides for the appropriation of a license to use the inventions, the appropriation thus made being sanctioned by the means of compensation for which the statute provides.

1. Injunction, 137. Preliminary injunction. Grounds for denial.

An injunction pendente lite is always of grace and not of right, and will not be granted where it would be prejudicial to public or governmental interests.

2. Patents, 287. Appropriation of license by United States. Contractor for making device for Government. Liability for infringement.

Act of June 25, 1910, chapter 423 (36 Stat., 851; Comp. St., 1913, sec. 9465), which provides that the owner of a patent covering an invention which shall be used by the United States without license, may recover reasonable compensation for such use by suit in the Court of Claims, in effect provides for the appropriation by the Government, by right of eminent domain, of a license to use any patented invention, which includes also the right to make the patented device; and, having such right, the Government may contract for the making of all or any part of the same, and the contractor is protected against liability for infringement, the owner of the patent being limited to the remedy provided by the statute.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not very particular as to what committee this bill shall be referred. It is probable that either the Committee on Patents or the Committee on Military Affairs would have jurisdiction on it.

Mr. NELSON. Inasmuch as the matter is patented, I think the bill ought to go to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. KNOX. Will the Senator from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Does not the Senator from Ohio believe that a broader course than the one suggested by his bill is advisable not only in respect to the patents upon salvarsan but in respect to all German patents? Why should the bill be limited to permit the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to manufacture salvarsan under the German patent? Why should not all American citizens be permitted to manufacture under German patents not only salvarsan but all other articles, such as dye material and half a dozen other important things that go into American manufactures and are covered by patent. That is the course which has been pursued by Great Britain, and I think it is the course which should be pursued by the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. I had that matter in mind. The Senator will find that the bill is broader in its scope than he seems to think. It does not apply to salvarsan alone, but applies to all drugs, medicines, remedies, or devices which are covered by patents and relating, however, to the subject of the public health It may be that the committee in its wisdom will see fit to amend the bill so as to make it apply to all patents, trade-marks, and copyrights. For myself I should doubt the wisdom of that course.

Mr. KNOX. That was my understanding of the scope of the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. The bill of the Senator from Minnesota is broad enough to include all patent rights, as I understand.

Mr. NELSON. Only those in which this preparation, salvarsan, is introduced.

Mr. KNOX. Does not the Senator from Minnesota think that this ought to extend to all German patents, following the British precedent?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; I think it would be very wise; but it seems to me the bill ought to go to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. KNOX. I quite agree with that.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I had in mind the further fact that Americans have many patents in these foreign countries, and I was not quite clear in my own mind as to whether or not we should at this time be willing to go so far as to invalidate all patents held by enemy countries, but should leave that matter to be determined a little later. I felt quite sure that no objection could be urged from any source if we should permit the Government to manufacture these articles, and then provide that patentees living in the United States might have their remedy in the Court of Claims, to assert any claims for damages which they might care to assert.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill which I introduced simply suspends the rights of patentees and allows our people to manufacture freely, leaving the question of whatever compensation may be due the patentees to be subsequently adjusted. The bill simply throws the door open so that our own chemists may manufacture freely in this country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota if his bill was referred to the Committee on Patents?

Mr. NELSON. The bill was referred to the Committee on Patents, together with a letter from the Mayo Bros., of Rochester, and their entire staff.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not hear the answer of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the question which was propounded by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]; which was, Why should not anybody be allowed during the war to manufacture drugs on which Germans hold patents, instead of having that right limited to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. POMERENE. I have no doubt of the right of the Government to use such patented articles for its own purposes under the law of 1910. I had some doubt, however, about the wisdom of allowing private individuals to manufacture these drugs or articles in violation of what might be the patent rights of bona fide holders.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Senator, in his bill, provides that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may sell the articles generally to the people.

Mr. POMERENE. I do so provide; yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Therefore I do not see any distinction between allowing the people to make these articles for themselves or buying them from the Government.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps there is not a very wide distinction, but I am not particularly enamored of this form of bill. I simply want some relief for the people. I hope the matter will be referred to the committee, and that we may have an early report from the committee.

Mr. President, it seems to me, in view of the fact that the bill of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] was referred to the Committee on Patents and is now before them, this bill ought also to be referred to that committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Ohio that though I am a member of the Committee on Patents I did not know that the bill of the Senator from Minnesota had been referred to that committee; but I am glad the Senator from Ohio has called attention to the matter and has introduced his own bill. So far as I am concerned, I shall use every endeavor to give it the very earliest consideration.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I want to assure the Senator from Connecticut that I have no pride of opinion as to the form of the bill. All we want is relief.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand.

Mr. CALDER rose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator from New York will allow me, in connection with this matter I send to the desk a letter, which I have just received from a prominent physician of my State, calling attention to resolutions of two prominent medical societies, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

HARTFORD, CONN., May 26, 1917.

Senator FRANK B BRANDEGEE,
Room 425, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The patents on salvarsan are held by a German firm. The price is $4.50 per dose of 6 decigrams. If our chemists were permitted to make it, the drug could be sold after a short time for 50 cents or less.

There is a great deal of interest now being manifested in Congress regarding the abrogation of the patents on salvarsan. It is most desirable to declare them void or to enact such legislation as would relieve the situation permanently and not simply during the period of the war.

At the meeting of the Hartford Medical Society about a month ago, and at the spring meeting of the Middlesex Society held in Middletown, resolutions were passed recommending the abrogation of these patents.

Very sincerely, yours,

HENRY F. STOLL.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, in connection with the discussion of this subject I notice that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has spoken of Mr. Herman A. Metz, of the city of New York, who represents, as I understand, the German owners of the salvarsan patent. I know Mr. Metz intimately. At one time he was the comptroller of our city, and he was recently a Member of the House of Representatives. He is a patriotic American citizen, and if the War and Navy Departments call upon Mr. Metz to give to the Government the free use of these patents during the continuance of this war, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind but that he would willingly do so. I contemplate calling his attention to the discussion to-day in the Senate, and shall personally ask him to do this.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Patents.

INVESTIGATION OF DEFECTIVE ORDNANCE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I request the Chair to lay before the Senate Senate resolution 71, which was submitted by me on Friday last and went over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 71) as follows:

Whereas a few days ago a lamentable accident occurred on the merchant ship Mongolia, whereby two Red Cross nurses, who were en route to the battle fields of Europe upon an errand of mercy, were instantly killed, said accident being due, it is charged, to defective shells employed in gun practice, under the direction of officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy; and

Whereas, according to newspaper reports, based upon statements alleged to have been made by a rear admiral of the United States Navy, previous accidents of a similar nature have occurred, though not attended by fatalities; and

Whereas this Nation is now engaged in the greatest war in the history of the world, in which its Navy is likely to play a conspicuous part, a participancy in which the element of accident should be reduced, if possible, to a negligible quantity: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate to make a careful inquiry into the causes of the recent accidents on shipboard, due to defective ammunition, or otherwise, with a view to preventing similar occurrences hereafter.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, in presenting this resolution I wish to disavow any other than a patriotic purpose, born of my desire to serve my country and protect her sons and daughters.

No Senator on this floor was readier than I to vote for the resolution declaring a state of war; none more willingly supported the $7,000,000,000 loan act, the conscription bill, the $3,000,000,000 appropriation for the equipment of our Army and Navy. Furthermore, I do not hesitate to say that, in the trying months to come, I shall support every proper measure which will clothe the administration with the power to carry on this war effectively and successfully.

But there is one fundamental fact which I propose to emphasize with all the power at my command. This is not a one-man war; this is not a one-party war; this is not the President's war; this is not the war of the War Department or of the Navy Department. There are many agencies, but only one principal—the United States of America. This is a war of the American people, and every American citizen is called upon, or will be called upon, to render the highest degree of service of which he or she is capable toward a successful issue of this supreme struggle.

Such being the case, every citizen of the Republic has the right to know—and that right I sustain—every phase of national development along the line of offensive or defensive service, unless such publicity is reasonably certain to prejudice the success of our arms.

Of the many remarkable expressions to which the Chief Magistrate of the Nation—a past master in the art of word painting—has given utterance, none has so strongly commended itself to me as "pitiless publicity." Upon more than one occasion the President has reiterated his belief in that doctrine, in the enunciation of which he awakened a responsive echo in every American heart.

I do not wish to be misunderstood, Mr. President. I appreciate the importance, the absolute necessity, of concealing from the enemy certain facts appertaining to the movements of our land and naval forces, and therefore the withholding from general circulation of news which might prejudice our cause; but I denounce that mawkish and stupid doctrine that the people of America must be kept in total ignorance of every material fact bearing upon the preparation for war and the prosecution of it, when every loyal citizen of the Nation, with his breast ablaze with patriotic ardor, is awaiting, alert, vigilant, and expectant for some item of news which will keep his soul on fire and his enthusiasm up to the highest possible pitch.

During the first year of this great world war the British nation "muddled" along, ineffective, nonprogressive, demoralized, always on the defensive. To-day she is the dominant power among the continental nations, and, with the material aid of America, will eventually save humanity and civilization from the despotism which the mad monarch of central Europe seeks to superimpose upon the world. And what has brought about this remarkable transformation? Nothing save the "pitiless publicity" of the great newspapers controlled by Lord Northcliffe, which, almost unaided, and against the protests of thousands of reactionary Englishmen, overturned cabinets, evolved order from chaos, and placed the destinies of the British nation and of the civilized world in the keeping of the greatest of modern Europeans, Lloyd George.

We must not lose sight of the supreme fact that we Americans are upon the outer edge of the most stupendous war which the pages of history record. We will soon be involved in the awfulness of actual warfare, of a character which human ingenuity can not foresee and can cope with only by the exercise of extraordinary application and efficiency. Indeed, Mr. President, I feel persuaded that former Ambassador Gerard spoke only the truth when he said a few days ago:

> If Russia stacks arms and German submarines continue to litter the ocean with corpses of the merchant marine, Uncle Sam will have to bear the brunt of the great battle practically alone.

This is a momentous responsibility we face. Yet we must face it gravely, like men, and wise men at that. The time is not far distant when some of our gallant young Americans must meet the enemy, and blood will flow. We shall deplore this, but such is war, and we must expect it, at the same time steeling our hearts against undue emotionalism.

However, we have a right to expect that the element of accident shall be reduced to a minimum, to a negligible quantity. We surely have a right to demand that none of our brave young men shall suffer death at the hands of their comrades or as a result of defective equipment placed at their disposal.

Within two weeks, I understand, five of our aviators have met death in experimental or training work. Whether these accidents were due to carelessness upon the part of the victims or to defective machinery I do not know. I can only venture the opinion that such results are deplorable.

The most shocking occurrence, however, along this line is that brought to our attention a few days ago when the merchant ship Mongolia steamed back to New York Harbor with the information that two Red Cross nurses had been killed as the result of the premature explosion of a shell fired in gun practice.

This was a pitiful story. A band of brave young American women had embarked for the scene of carnage across the sea, to bind up the wounds of suffering victims of Prussian brutality and to soothe the fevered brows of men stricken with those innumerable diseases incident to twentieth-century warfare. As they sat upon the deck of the ship, with no thought of danger, instant death came to these angels of mercy.

It will, Mr. President, ever be a cause for unspeakable regret that the first American victims in this war were women, accidentally killed by the firing of guns on an American ship by American gunners.

Following this distressing occurrence, we learn from information open to the public that similar accidents took place a few days previously, one of our rear admirals having made a statement to that effect, so I am informed. In these other cases, happily, there were no fatalities.

My sole purpose in offering this resolution, Mr. President, is to learn just how these accidents occurred, not with a view to punishing anyone or to cast any aspersions upon any official or any department. My one object is to prevent such accidents hereafter. I am sure every Senator upon this floor will agree with me that this is a duty we owe the 180,000 young men we have called into our service to uphold the prestige of our Navy and to honor the Nation.

Upon this point publicity can do no harm; it may do much good, for it may save many precious human lives. I feel convinced, Mr. President, that the country demands this information, and I call upon Senators upon both sides of the Chamber to support this resolution, which is presented in no partisan or hypercritical spirit, but solely for the public good.

Let us stand by the President in his demand for "pitiless publicity." We never will win this war by supine secretiveness. I ask, Mr. President, for the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the adoption of this resolution, if it is amended so as to provide that the investigation shall be conducted by the Naval Committee, which has charge of naval matters; and I will offer an amendment to that effect, which, I understand, the Senator from New Jersey is prepared to accept.

I wish to say, in this connection, that there is a misconception, possibly a misunderstanding, on the part of the Senator from New Jersey as to the accident on the Mongolia. Something more than 200 ships in the merchant marine have been armed by the Navy, and between four and five thousand sailors have been furnished these ships in the merchant marine. The accident on the Mongolia and the premature explosion of some shells on the St. Louis have been practically the only mishaps that have occurred on merchant ships or in practice in the Navy. This is a phenomenal record of efficiency worthy of great praise.

As to the St. Louis, of the 45 shells which were fired 9 exploded in the gun and 4 exploded before the shells struck the mark. As soon as this occurred and the St. Louis returned, 89 shells were taken off that ship—and they were shells for 6-inch guns—and sent to be tested at the Indianhead Proving Ground. Out of those 89 shells 87 were perfect, there being no trouble whatever with them. Two of the 89 prematurely exploded. These were examined, and one was found to be a shell made in 1898. The other was a shell of which the lining, as it might be called, was thinner than the regulations now require.

There has been a great dispute between naval authorities as to the thickness of shells. The thinner the shell is the more powder can be put in it for explosive purposes when it hits the mark; and, on the other hand, it is contended that the less powder there is in the shell and the thicker its walls the greater its penetrating qualities will be. Since that time the Navy has prohibited the use of shells made prior to 1898, and prohibited the use of any shells that have not been lined in accordance with recent specifications.

The Mongolia did not have on board shells made prior to 1900. All shells made prior to 1900 have been discarded. The shells on the Mongolia were all right. The shell struck all right. There was no premature explosion of the shell. On the 6-inch gun, however—and this is the only gun that has this arrangement—the shells are entirely too heavy for one man to handle. The shell weighs 105 pounds, and the cartridge in which the powder is placed that shoots the shell out of the gun weighs 60 pounds, so they had it made in two parts, a cartridge in which the powder is put and then the shell, inside of which there is the powder which explodes the shell when it enters an enemy ship. These are the only guns the shells for which are so made. Now, to make effective powder made with nitrate of cotton, we put over the cartridge what is known as a mouth cover, composed of copper, which prevents any air from getting in. If any air gets in, our powder is not as effective as the English powder. They tell me that if there is no air or moisture to it the powder made out of cotton is more effective than the powder made out of glycerine with nitrate.

The remarkable thing about the shell that killed these two nurses in that unfortunate accident is this: The shell was all right; it went off all right, but the copper mouthpiece or cup that was over the top went out and came back, due to a reaction, in some way. It is supposed that it hit the water, rebounded in some way, hit one of the posts that supported the upper deck, broke into three pieces, and killed two nurses. I have inquired, and have been told that they know of only one accident of the kind that ever occurred before. It occurred once on the battleship Wyoming. It has been stated that a similar accident occurred on a French liner not long ago, coming over, in practice. That the mouth cup of the cartridge that held the shell could go out and come back to the ship again is such a remarkable thing that I do not believe the naval experts would have believed it if it had not actually occurred.

There is a misconception in the country to the effect that shells like those that were on the St. Louis, and which it was found had not been entirely up to the standard, were used on the Mongolia. As I understand, the shells on the Mongolia were perfect, and they have here in the Navy Department the mouth cup that was over the cartridge, showing that this was the cause of the accident.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does not Admiral Earle's report state that shells were in use made prior to the year 1900?

Mr. SWANSON. They were on the St. Louis.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is proof, then, that the Navy Department is now using shells 17 to 19 years old, is it not?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, a copper shell, if it is made of the proper thickness, does not deteriorate. They put the powder in these shells quite recently. The powder was put in along last August or October, and they were tested in every way. The way shells are tested—they can not be tested in any other way—is this: They take 3 out of the 500 shells; those 3 are sent to the proving grounds and tested. They pick out what they think are the three worst ones. Then the shells are inspected by a naval officer and a civilian, and they watch the entire process of manufacture of every shell. After they have been reported on favorably by an inspector and a civil officer they are then put in a magazine. All of this ammunition was taken out of a regular magazine. It had been inspected, and none was put in there until it was inspected.

If the Senator will permit me, at the battle of Jutland some of the German shells did not explode at all and some of them exploded prematurely. If it had not been for that, the few battleships of the English fleet that were in that battle would have been absolutely destroyed. It is nearly impossible to make every shell explode at the proper time, not prematurely. It is intended that when the shell hits something, by a reaction or the stoppage of the shell, a cap explodes it. If there is any interruption in the travel of the shell through the gun, it will explode in the gun. It is a very intricate piece of machinery; and what I want to impress on the Senate at this time is simply that the accidents which have occurred in the American Navy, with 200 merchant vessels armed hurriedly, have been very small in comparison with the accidents in other navies.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator believe and state that shells 17 years old are effective?

Mr. SWANSON. If they have the proper thickness. They do not put the powder in them immediately. The shell is inspected. This powder was loaded in the shells last August or October or December; I do not know the exact date. I simply make this statement because, while we shall be glad to investigate it thoroughly, to the satisfaction of the Senator, I have here a statement as to who made the shells, by whom they were inspected, when they were put in the magazine, when the powder was put in, who attended to that, and so forth. All that detail will be furnished the Senator.

I simply want to impress on the Senate at this time the fact that the shells that it was said would not be used after the premature explosion on the St. Louis have not been used. These shells on the St. Louis have not been used since, and this shell did not explode prematurely. It was simply a rebound of the copper mouth cup in the cartridge that kept the powder absolutely dry.

Some nations use zinc. We found that zinc will not keep out air and moisture as well as copper. It is only used in the 6-inch guns. In a gun over 6 inches, on account of the nature of the gun, you put in the shell first and then you put in the bag of powder. It is kept absolutely dry in a kind of box or tank on all shells over 6 inches. Those under 6 inches are all made together, and consequently no trouble could occur with them of this character; but there has been, not only in the case of this nation but other nations, more difficulty with the 6-inch shell than others on account of the fact that they are separated, and you must have this mouth cup to keep the powder absolutely dry.

I have an amendment here which I will offer in a moment. I wish to say that the Secretary of the Navy has not the slightest objection to the very fullest and most thorough investigation of this matter; neither has Admiral Earle, who is the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, one of the most capable and most efficient men in the Navy. He invites the fullest investigation of this matter. I wish to assure the Senator that the Naval Committee will be delighted to examine the matter thoroughly, take any suggestions from him, summon before the committee any persons whose names he may suggest, and ask any questions that he may suggest.

I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, before the amendment is offered, may I request that the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee permit the insertion in the RECORD from the Official Bulletin of the report of Admiral Earle, ordered by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that being done.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Official Bulletin of Wednesday, May 23, 1917.]

REPORTS ON THE AMMUNITION FURNISHED ARMED VESSELS.

Secretary of the Navy Daniels has given out the following report of Rear Admiral Earle, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, made at the direction of the Secretary, in regard to the alleged defective ammunition furnished to armed merchantmen:

"Acting in accordance with your verbal instructions, the following report is submitted relative to the defective performance of certain ordnance material recently placed on board armed liners:

"The first American liner to be armed was the steamship Manchuria, on March 10, 1917. The arming of other large liners followed immediately. The guns used were of the best type known at the present date and were nearly all absolutely new, having fired but the rounds necessary to test them for strength before permitting them to be used with service charges.

ALL AMMUNITION TESTED.

"The ammunition for these guns was assembled according to standard methods in December, 1916. The usual thorough tests of all this ammunition were made at the naval proving ground, and all tests resulted in perfect performances.

"The armed liner St. Louis, on her first trip to Liverpool, where she arrived about March 26, 1917, fired 45 service shells at an iceberg for a target. This firing was held in accordance with the instructions of the bureau in order to test the mounts, guns, ammunition, and to train the guns' crews. Several shells burst prematurely, some inside the bore of the guns, others before striking the target. The damage to the bore of the guns caused thereby was sufficient to necessitate their being relined.

NEW GUNS PLACED ON LINER.

"Upon her return to New York the guns and shells were immediately removed and new guns, with a new supply of shells, issued to the ship. Later on one other shell exploded prematurely, as well as one of the same caliber on both the Mongolia and the St. Paul. In none of these cases was the gun damaged beyond remedy by relining, which relining has been done.

"The development of modern ordnance has been extremely rapid, and the comparative freedom of our Navy from serious accidents in connection therewith has been a source of satisfaction to the service, but mishaps with ordnance material can not be absolutely prevented.

EXPLOSIVES RETESTED.

"It is necessary in all work on explosives to draw deductions from the actual tests made at the proving ground. However, it must be borne in mind that material used as an explosive is designed to spend all of its force in an instant space of time and can not be relied upon with absolute certainty to give the same result in all cases. An example of this is well shown by the subsequent action of the supposedly defective ammunition taken from the steamships St. Louis and Mongolia. Eighty-nine rounds of this ammunition were fired at the proving ground immediately following the premature bursts in an effort to develop a reason for such incidents. These rounds were fired, nearly all, at higher chamber pressures than were the service rounds fired on board these vessels. In 87 rounds both the shell and the fuses functioned perfectly. One shell broke up, investigation showing that it had been made prior to 1900, but had been accepted as a suitable 6-inch shell, and the second one was a shell that had been examined prior to firing and found to have been a little thinner walled than the latest design in use.

REASON FOR PREMATURE BURSTS.

"The conclusion reached is that all 6-inch shells and fuses manufactured since the year 1900 are satisfactory, and that the premature bursts so unfortunately occurring on our armed liners may be attributed to shell made prior to 1900 and made possibly with slightly thinner walls than the latest type of shells.

"On the return of the St. Louis from her first trip, about April 9, 1917, all such shells were removed, and no such shells are afloat now on armed liners. This procedure was also adopted at once in the case of all 6-inch ammunition for vessels of the Navy.

"Prior to this happening the Bureau of Ordnance had every reason to expect that every shell in its magazines of 6-inch caliber was a satisfactory shell."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to point out, for the information of the Senate, the section which reads:

On the return of the St. Louis from her first trip, about April 9, 1917, all such shells were removed, and no such shells are afloat now on armed liners. This procedure was also adopted at once in the case of all 6-inch ammunition for vessels of the Navy.

And three weeks later the defect, whatever it was, was found in the shell on the Mongolia.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator makes this mistake: Out of 89 shells taken off the St. Louis and tested at the Indianhead Proving Grounds, two were found defective—one made in 1898 and the other made of thinner material than is now required. Those two were the only ones that were defective. Those shells were removed, and none of them have been given out.

If the Senator will read the account of the Mongolia, there was no trouble with the shell. The shell did not explode. The shell went on its way. The mouth cup—that is, the head of the cartridge, in which is the powder that drives the shell out, went out and came back on the ship, hit a post, and broke into three pieces. They have that here. That was no defect in the shell. It was something, as I have said, that never happened before, except on the battleship Wyoming. It has been stated that it happened once on the Wyoming, and it hurt a man on his face. There was no defect in the shell. It was an occurrence so remarkable that it would not have been believed that the force that carried the shell out would have failed to carry the mouth cup out; but for some unaccountable reason it came back with a rebound. There was no defect in the shell. That has been the misconception in the papers, and that is the misconception under which the Senator is laboring. The language in the statement might not have been as clear as it ought to have been, but the shell report will show that it went out perfectly, exploded perfectly, and the only trouble was with the mouthpiece that is part of the cartridge which explodes and drives the shell out, which came back with a rebound.

I should like to say that the Navy is now trying to see if it can not get something that will answer as well as copper, and I should like to say also that on a battleship nothing like that could have occurred, because the guns are all behind shields on a battleship.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia offers certain amendments, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 1 it is proposed to strike out the article "a" and to insert the words "the Naval Affairs"; strike out the words "five Senators" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Senate"; in line 2, strike out the words "appointed by the President of the Senate" and insert in lieu thereof the word "directed"; after the word "careful," insert the words "and searching"; also, on page 2, after line 3, to add: "Resolved, That the report of such findings shall be made to the Senate not later than June 15, 1917."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to accept the amendments suggested by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Whereas a few days ago a lamentable accident occurred on the merchant ship Mongolia, whereby two Red Cross nurses, who were en route to the battle fields of Europe upon an errand of mercy, were instantly killed, said accident being due, it is charged, to defective shells employed in gun practice, under the direction of officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy; and

Whereas, according to newspapers reports based upon statements alleged to have been made by a rear admiral of the United States Navy, previous accidents of a similar nature have occurred, though not attended by fatalities; and

Whereas this Nation is now engaged in the greatest war in the history of the world, in which its Navy is likely to play a conspicuous part, a participancy in which the element of accident should be reduced, if possible, to a negligible quantity: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate be directed to make a careful and searching inquiry into the causes of the recent accidents on shipboard, due to defective ammunition or otherwise, with a view to preventing similar occurrences hereafter.

Resolved, That the report of such findings shall be made to the Senate not later than June 15, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, morning business is closed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2344) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I requested the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill to pass over section 7 until I could hear from the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry. In conversation over the phone I got the impression that the department desired the full amount of the sum proposed by the committee in this section. Instead of getting a letter from the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, I have a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston, which is not in accord with the information that I understood was intended to be given to me over the telephone. I am going to ask the Secretary to read this letter.

Before the letter is read I wish to say to the Senate that if this great campaign against the cattle tick, which is so disastrous to the cattle industry of the country, shall be brought to an early and effective settlement it must be done by continuous, persistent effort. Every time the work is stopped this insidious, voracious little enemy to the cattle industry recovers the territory from which it has been driven. It would be wise economy, I submit, for Congress to appropriate sufficient money to carry on the work to an effective and complete termination. It is a matter of vital concern to the people of the entire Republic directly, and remotely to the whole world.

I ask the Secretary to read the letter from the Secretary of Agriculture. It explains itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, May 26, 1917.

DEAR SENATOR VARDAMAN: The following indicates the objects and amounts of expenditures for the Bureau of Animal Industry as revised May 22:

	June, 1917.	Fiscal year 1918.	Total.
1. General administration	$5,300	$62,200	$67,500
2. Poultry and poultry products	11,100	133,300	144,400
3. Dairying	21,600	258,600	280,200
4. Animal diseases, exclusive of hog cholera, tick eradication, dourine	52,000	625,300	677,300
5. Eradication of hog cholera	17,900	213,400	231,300
6. Eradication of cattle ticks	14,000	168,900	182,900
7. Eradication of dourine	1,000	11,600	12,600
Total	122,900	1,473,300	1,596,200

This revision of the former statement was made because of the passage of time and of an opportunity for fuller consideration. You will note that the item included for the eradication of the cattle tick is $182,900. The original estimate for the increase in the cattle-tick work was $400,000, as indicated in my statement before the Senate committee. I have some doubt whether, in view of the difficulty of getting a sufficient force of experienced men, of securing the requisite effective cooperation from communities, and of overcoming certain difficulties in the legislation of some States, we could expend efficiently more than the amount of the revised estimates. I do not see how, in any circumstances, we could expend a larger sum than the original estimates. You will recall that we have $631,560 available in the regular appropriation act for the next fiscal year.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I should like to have a few words to say upon the cattle-tick subject. I had the honor of introducing the first bill that was passed on this subject, which became a law in June, 1906. Since that time we have spent in the neighborhood of $3,000,000 in trying to eradicate the cattle tick from the South. We have succeeded in driving it out of about 43 per cent of the territory.

I do not believe Senators appreciate the importance of the eradication of the cattle tick and what it would mean to the American people.

When the question first came up in 1906 we had a very elaborate hearing before the House Committee on Agriculture, which was attended by the then Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson. I will never forget a three-minute speech that he made before that committee. A number of eminent agriculturists came from the South, who testified. Mr. Wilson sat in the back of the room and listened for several hours to these southern scientists. When they got through, at my earnest solicitation he advanced to the table and spoke in about these words:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, you doubtless recall that about three years ago, when the foot-and-mouth disease broke out in New England you gave me $500,000 to drive it out. I drove it out at an expenditure of about $300,000. I did not keep the balance of the money. I returned $200,000 to the National Treasury.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if you will give me money enough I will drive the cattle tick into the Gulf of Mexico.

And he meant what he said. If we had given enough money the cattle tick would long ago have been completely eradicated.

After a great deal of effort the bill pending at that time was passed, carrying $82,500 for cattle-tick eradication, and since then the fight has gone on slowly but progressively, and this awful pest has been driven from many portions of the South.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator and others have spoken about the cattle tick having been driven from certain territory. After it is driven out does it stay out of the territory?

Mr. RANSDELL. It does, Senator. The cattle-tick fever is caused by the bite of a little insect known as the Texas cattle tick. It produces the splenetic fever. That tick can be completely eradicated from a given area by pursuing certain methods, which I will attempt to describe briefly in a few moments; and when you once get rid of it, it rarely ever comes back. It can be introduced again, but if you are watchful and careful it will never come back. As a matter of fact, the tick has been completely exterminated from over 300,000 square miles since we began the fight in June, 1906, and it has not gone back. In some little of that territory it has returned, but in the main it has been exterminated.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be delighted.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator, of course, understands that if cattle infected with ticks are permitted to go into a territory again the tick would be introduced.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is very true, but we do not allow cattle infected with ticks to go into the territory. One of the means is to quarantine very carefully against tick-infected animals. We preserve a strict quarantine against the tick-infested territory, just as we have a general law now establishing a quarantine line. I will state where it ran when I first began this investigation several years ago it has been lowered since. It then ran from about Norfolk, Va., across the lower line of the State of Virginia; thence into Tennessee; thence, crossing the river and taking in the greater portion of the State of Arkansas, southwesterly through Oklahoma; thence southwesterly, leaving most of the State of Texas below the line, to the Rio Grande. Then, following the Rio Grande, going across the southern border of New Mexico and Arizona, reaching the California boundary, it went north for quite a distance and then across to the Pacific Ocean, leaving a large portion of the State of California in the tick area. Since that time all of Virginia has been freed, all of Tennessee has been freed, all of Kentucky freed, the greater portion of North Carolina freed, much of Arkansas freed, and practically all of Oklahoma freed. A large portion of Texas and all of California that was infested has been freed of the tick, and very great benefits have accrued.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be delighted.

Mr. KENYON. My question to the Senator is in no controversial spirit, but I should like to inquire if there has been complete cooperation between the States and the Federal Government. I will state the reason why I ask the question. The Secretary of Agriculture, as the Senator knows, appeared before our committee and suggested that $400,000 of this sum the Bureau of Animal Industry desired for the eradication of cattle tick. I voted against it, and I think some others did, but the committee put in two or three million dollars more to be used for that and other purposes. The Secretary said that there were difficulties in the way of largely increased expenditures. Some of the communities, he said, are not prepared to cooperate effectively. Then he went on and spoke of the law of Louisiana, and stated that compulsion under the Louisiana law is not effective until 1918. It was not explained at that time what he meant, and I have been curious to know.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will state to the Senator that the Louisiana Legislature passed a law requiring everyone to dip his cattle for the purpose of eradicating the cattle tick, but the law was not made compulsory until some time in the year 1918. People were allowed to go ahead and get used to it, in the first place, and, in the second place, it requires considerable time to prepare the vats. The vats are quite expensive. Moreover, it requires a great deal of educational work to train the people up to do something new. It is the old story of prejudice against this thing arising from the ignorance of many in the community, and I am sorry to say that some of those in my own State are ignorant. We want the law to be thoroughly explained to them. We wanted them to have plenty of time to get the dipping vats built and in good shape before we began to prosecute criminally, as we will do next year, those who do not comply with the law.

Mr. KENYON. Is it not the theory, then, of the Secretary that until you have this cooperation and until these communities are educated along the line the Senator suggests we can not use the large fund that is sought to be given in this bill?

Mr. RANSDELL. My understanding is, I will say, that we can not use the full amount of the $400,000 probably. He said in a letter which he has written the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] that he could use, I believe, $182,000.

Mr. KENYON. At any rate, he was pretty sure that he could not use more than $400,000.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. RANSDELL. Gladly.

Mr. GORE. I should like to have read in the RECORD at this place an extract from the statement of Mr. Rawl before the House committee, to the effect that he can use $400,000 by adding to and perfecting his present organization. I think the document is at the desk.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have the document before me, if the Senator would like to have me read it.

Mr. GORE. Very well; I will ask the Senator to read it. It shows the foundation upon which is based the contention for a larger amount than $400,000.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will read from Mr. Rawl's statement.

Mr. GORE. I call the Senator's attention to page 62.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. Rawl says:

Another item of a million and a half is for the purpose of suppressing diseases of live stock, and it is proposed to put on additional men, averaging about 10 to each State. The more important live-stock States would, of course, use many more than the less important ones. These men would be utilized in suppressing all animal diseases, such as tuberculosis, contagious abortion, blackleg, anthrax, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you regard that as an emergency proposition?

Mr. RAWL. Yes. If there is an outbreak of disease in a community and it can be suppressed quickly and the animals saved from destruction we shall have so many more animals; hence this is considered an emergency measure.

The CHAIRMAN. Take up your next item.

Mr. RAWL. In addition to that just mentioned for general disease suppression, there is an item of $500,000 for the eradication of hog cholera.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the total for your bureau?

Mr. RAWL. A little more than $4,000,000. I have not the exact totals, including an item of $400,000 for tick eradication and $35,000 for the eradication of dourine.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Senator to turn to page 62.

Mr. RANSDELL. Continuing on page 62:

Mr. ANDERSON. What I am getting at is this: I think it is very doubtful that you can get the men this coming year to carry your plan into full operation, and that it is quite possible estimates are very much higher than the amount which you will possibly expend, in view of that fact, and consequently I ask the question whether the estimates are based on what you think ought to be done and hope might be done, or whether they are based on any real information on the number of men you can actually get.

Mr. RAWL. I should say that the estimates are based upon what we hope to accomplish. In some instances we have some idea of the number of men available. I do not think there will be any doubt about getting veterinarians enough to do the veterinary work and utilize that money advantageously. I think there are a sufficient number of them in the country to supply that need. Now, as to some of the other items, as to whether there are enough or not, I do not know absolutely.

Mr. President, I wish to read into the RECORD at this time a statement prepared for me by Mr. Rawl of the Bureau of Animal Industry and again I ask the attention of Senators. It is not very long and it will show the vast importance of this general subject.

TICK ERADICATION A NECESSITY.

"The cattle tick is to-day one of the greatest obstacles in the path of agricultural progress in the South. Nature intended the South to be one of the great cattle regions of the world, but the tick has interposed its veto. Because of the tick the meat supply of the entire country is curtailed and the southern farmer is prevented from realizing the full possibilities of a sound, diversified agriculture. Without live stock on the farm such an agriculture is impossible; with the tick, live stock can never take its proper place in farm management. As a feeder of stock, the farm in tick-infested sections can not compete successfully with the farmer in tick-free sections.

"Statisticians have variously estimated the annual loss to the country from the tick at from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000."

That is a pretty good sum, Senators—from forty to one hundred million dollars annually by reason of the ravages of this tick.

"As a matter of fact, no figures can adequately represent the effect upon the country of a pest the evil influence of which is felt in so many different ways. We can estimate, perhaps, the tax which the tick levies upon the cattle industry to-day, but we can not fix the extent to which the industry could be developed were this crushing burden once removed. The cattle tick, and the cattle tick alone, is responsible for splenetic fever, which not only kills annually thousands of cattle, but also prevents the importation of pure-bred stock into the infested region. From such animals as the tick does not kill it sucks large quantities of blood, greatly reducing the weight of the animal and its value as beef. It reduces the milk flow of dairy cattle in severe cases as much as 42 per cent, and under all circumstances very appreciably. It ruins the hides for use in the finer grades of leather and depreciates their price in consequence. It necessitates onerous quarantine regulations which restrict the markets for ticky cattle, increase the cost of disposing of them, and further lowers the price to the farmer.

"These facts are beyond question. They affect the income in one way or another of practically every farmer in the tick-infested States and they hinder the development of sound agriculture over a large and fertile area. Unfortunately, the South has so long been accustomed to the tick that the extent of the evil is not thoroughly appreciated. If it were, the tick would now be a thing of the past, for the possibility of complete eradication has been demonstrated as absolutely as the desirability."

That is as true as gospel. They have been used to cattle ticks all their lives, and do not understand what could be accomplished if they were destroyed.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. As a general rule, in the South cattle which have remained there for any length of time, or which have been bred there, are practically immune from splenetic fever, are they not?

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true.

Mr. FALL. But cattle which are imported, which are being brought in there, the new blood, will have splenetic fever?

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true.

Mr. FALL. Then, the cattle which are exported from the South, from the fever and tick districts, are liable to infect the ranges where they are sent?

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true.

Mr. FALL. And to cause splenetic fever in other cattle?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; and for that reason we can not improve the breeds of cattle in the South by bringing the finer breeds from the North; and when we take our cattle away we are obliged to dip them for immediate slaughter and they have to be sold at from half a cent to a cent a pound less than are cattle which might be fed in other places and that could be kept indefinitely or turned on ranges if necessary. So it handicaps us in every way.

Mr. FALL. I thought those were the conditions.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir; those are the conditions, and I thank the Senator for the suggestion. This statement continues:

"When systematic eradication work was understaken in 1906, 741,515 square miles were under quarantine because of the cattle tick."

And by "quarantine" is meant there was a line drawn right across that territory and no animals could be carried from that territory into the tick-free sections except under the strictest regulations and subject to immediate slaughter. These animals to-day are subject to that terrible backset or disadvantage of half a cent to a cent a pound lower price.

"On March 1, 1917, a total area of 312,012 square miles, or approximately 43 per cent of the original territory, had been cleaned of the tick and freed from quarantine. To free what remains is merely a matter of determination on the part of the tick's victims—the farmers of the South—for the expense involved is insignificant in comparison with the results that are certain to follow resolute work."

This gentleman says "the tick's victims—the farmers of the South." I say the whole American people are its victims, Mr. President, because if we had the South freed from the cattle tick to-day beef would be much cheaper than it is. It is now one of the highest-priced things we have to buy. There is no better region for raising cattle anywhere on earth than in the Southern States if it were not for the cattle tick and the Texas fever resulting therefrom. The winters are mild; grasses of every kind grow throughout the entire year there; we are not obliged to feed the cattle; they can live on the range for 365 days out of every year; and we could raise more cattle and raise them cheaper than anywhere else in the United States if we did not have this pest. It is a matter in which every citizen of the United States and every citizen of the world is interested.

Mr. GORE. And every allied army.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator from Oklahoma also suggests that every allied army is interested in it, and I accept the suggestion. They are very much interested.

Listen, now. This is all we want the Government to do.

"The Federal Government should contribute its share by supplying Federal inspectors, expert advice and supervision, and assistance in organizing and conducting campaigns of eradication. From the beginning of the work to the present time, the Department of Agriculture had expended for this purpose approximately $3,000,000."

We are not asking the Government to build cattle-dipping vats; we do not ask the Government to furnish the poison which we use to kill these ticks; we simply ask the Government to educate our people, to educate people who are densely ignorant on this subject, because they have been used to these ticks all their lives; they do not know any better, and it is hard to make them learn better.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. GORE. I should like to make the suggestion at this point in the Senator's remarks that for every dollar contributed by the Federal Government the States, counties, and localities contribute $2; which is the best possible guarantee of economy and wisdom in the expenditure of the money.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am satisfied that is correct. I do not know the exact proportions, but the various States and localities must have contributed a great deal more than the National Government has ever contributed.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am delighted to do so.

Mr. FALL. The inspectors, of course, referred to in this letter are those whose duty it is to see that before cattle are shipped from an infected district in interstate commerce they are free from ticks, or that they have been held in quarantine a certain length of time; that they have been dipped once, for instance, and held 10 days, and dipped again, and, if in the judgment of the inspector it is necessary, he can hold them for such further length of time in quarantine, as he may command, and order them dipped again before the cattle are allowed to be shipped. That is the only jurisdiction which the Government has.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is all; except in an educational way. The inspectors go around and tell the farmers how beneficial it would be to them to have their cattle dipped and encourage them to submit to dipping, and some of them assist in the dipping.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, if they take part in the dipping it is simply because the cattle can not be shipped in interstate commerce, for the railroads will not take a shipment in interstate commerce unless the cattle are shipped from certain districts which have been inspected.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true.

Mr. FALL. All the expenses, with the exception of the certificate of inspection, are paid by the cattle raisers and shippers.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is my understanding.

Mr. FALL. The inspection cost is the only expense that the Government is put to in any way, and the object of the appropriation is simply to provide inspectors and, as the Senator has said, for educational work.

Mr. RANSDELL. For inspection and educational work; that is all.

Mr. FALL. For instance, in my State of New Mexico the Government has never assisted in the eradication of the ticks; in fact, New Mexico was never, except temporarily during one year, I think, in the quarantine district at all, and that was because of the driving of a herd of cattle from Texas into New Mexico.

We have eradicated not only the ticks but the splenetic fever without the assistance of the Government. The inspector comes to the vat. With his instruments he measures the dip and sees that it is in the proper proportion, and unless he does that one can not ship the cattle in interstate commerce.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think the Senator states it correctly, as I understand the proposition. Continuing the reading, Mr. Rawl says:

"Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, and California have succeeded in completely wiping out the cattle tick. There is little doubt but that the entire State of Mississippi will be released from quarantine before the close of 1917. In all probability the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Alabama will be free from cattle tick during the year 1918."

I am sorry that I can not say the same for my own State. I am afraid it will not be free within the next year.

"The work is being pushed as rapidly in other States as the existing conditions and means at hand will permit.

"Hundreds of letters have been received in the United States Department of Agriculture from farmers and other interested persons, all residents of the tick-free territory of the South, testifying to the benefits derived from the destruction of the tick. The consensus of opinion in these letters indicates that on the average cattle are enhanced in value about $10 a head. They weigh one-fifth heavier, they grade one-fourth better, and that they are saved from Texas fever and from shrinkage on account of ticks; also that the cattle industry is increasing, that there is an increase in improved blood, that the milk yield of cows is increased about one-fourth, and that there is an increase of forage crops and silos.

"The department, however, is powerless to help those who do not wish to help themselves. The States and the counties must supply the materials and the labor for building and maintaining the dipping vats and must enforce local regulations for continuous, systematic dipping of all herds in the area in which work is in progress. Spasmodic, half-hearted, disorganized efforts will fail as certainly as regular, systematic work will succeed.

"The tick feeds entirely upon cattle and can not reproduce unless it obtains their blood. It lays its eggs, however, on the ground, preferably in some sheltered spot, where they hatch in from two to six weeks. The young ticks, or larvæ, as they are called, can subsist for a long time without nourishment and have been known to do so for months. As soon as they are able, they crawl up on the leaves of grass or weeds or to any position from which they can reach the bodies of cattle. There they fasten themselves to the softer portions of their victim's skin and proceed to suck blood. At this stage they are still so small that they are scarcely visible to the naked eye, but, nourished by the blood they draw, they develop rapidly until, in about two weeks, they are capable of reproduction. After this the female continues to increase until, thoroughly gorged with blood, she drops to the ground, lays her eggs, and dies."

She is, then, about the size of the end of my small finger, a rough, vicious-looking brute:

"This life history makes possible the eradication of the tick by systematic dipping of cattle in a plunge bath containing a standard arsenical solution. This solution is a virulent poison to the tick and kills all those with which it comes in contact. The cattle should be dipped once every two weeks. Since the ticks live for about three weeks on an animal, this offers two opportunities for the poison to reach them. Ticks cast off their skins twice in the course of their brief life and during this process of molting it is possible that the skin may protect the molting tick within from the effect of the poison. If two dippings are given, with an interval of two weeks between, the tick is sure to be caught once in an unprotected state and destroyed. The two dippings, however, are not enough to insure permanent eradication, because new seed ticks from infested pastures and premises attack the cattle afresh. For this reason dipping is continued at intervals of two weeks for four months or more, the final result being complete elimination of the entire breed.

"This method is not only more effective, but is in the end cheaper and simpler than such practices as spraying, pasture rotation, and similar precautions, which may diminish the evil temporarily but do not effect a permanent cure. The success of dipping is dependent, however, upon the cooperation of the entire community, for one neglected herd will in time reinfect its neighbors.

"That this cooperation can be secured if the situation is once thoroughly understood there is little doubt."

And here, Senators, let me say, is the necessity for the Government help. You all know that when the Government representative comes into a community, standing there for the might and jurisdiction of this great country of ours, people will listen to him who will pay no attention at all to local men. It is in the splendid educational work that has been done by these representatives of the Department of Agriculture, as well as in the inspection work, that we have received so much aid from the department in tick eradication.

"In Texas 28,805 square miles have now been freed from quarantine. The average cost has been only $5.25 per square mile, and the returns have exceeded this small sum to a degree that it is impossible to estimate.

"In this connection, however, although other factors unquestionably enter into the problem, it is instructive to compare the average values of beef cattle over 2 years old in tick-free areas with those in tick-infested areas, even before the present war-emergency prices became prevalent."

I hope Senators will listen to these figures:

"Texas had a higher average than any of the other tick-infested States, but this average of $40 a head compared most unfavorably with the average of $64 in Wyoming, $60 in Montana, $56 in Ohio and Illinois, and $54 in Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Colorado. In the other tick-infested States the difference is much more striking. In Florida and Georgia the average was only $18 a head"—

Think of that, Senators—$18 per head for a 2-year-old beef in Georgia as compared with $64 per head for the same beef in Wyoming—

"In Alabama it was $20, in Mississippi $22, and in Louisiana $24.

"A similar difference appears in the prevailing prices per pound of beef on the hoof. In Texas, again, this average was higher than in any of the other tick-infested States, but it was only 5.4 cents, while in by far the great majority of the tick-free States it was more than 6 cents. With the exception of Louisiana, where the average was 5.1, and Florida, where it was 5.3, none of the badly infested States had averages as high as 5 cents a pound.

"The principal causes for this difference in value are not far to seek. A severe infestation of ticks will result in the loss by sucking of 200 pounds of blood a year from an animal."

A loss by sucking of 200 pounds of blood per year. How can the animals thrive? How can such beef as that be good for man to eat?

"This blood has been made at the expense to the farmer, of pasture, feed, and labor. It should have been turned into sound beef, but instead it has gone to support the tick. The cattle are inferior in weight and in quality to those produced elsewhere, and consequently bring less on the market. Furthermore, outside of the quarantine area, ticky cattle can only be shipped in interstate commerce for immediate slaughter."

Senators will see what a terrible handicap that is. The cattle must be shipped for immediate slaughter.

"They can not be sold as feeders and they can not be transshipped to other markets which do not maintain quarantine pens. In consequence they sell too frequently for what the buyer is disposed to offer, and this is usually from one-half to 1 cent a pound less than the tick-free cattle bring.

"In addition, as long as the tick prevails it is impossible for the cattle owner to grade up his herd and realize the profit which comes from the production of graded stock instead of scrubs. To import pure-bred stock into a tick-infested area for the purpose of grading up a herd is to throw away money. The animals merely succumb to fever. Immunization of cattle has, it is true, been tried with some degree of success, but the process is expensive and at best gives only temporary relief. The tick is still there sucking blood and vitality from the animal.

"A less obvious but equally important effect of the tick upon the beef industry is the fact that it turns what should be a conservative business into a speculation. Even native cattle are not always immune to tick fever, and many banks are becoming reluctant to lend money on live stock in the tick-infested area."

I will say that in my State they are not in the habit of lending money at all on cattle; we have not established the business of lending money on cattle because of the ticks, and I am sure that is true of most of the Southern States.

"The security is not considered good. Credit is as essential in successful farming as it is in any other form of business, and the tick's influence in hindering its extension is proving a serious drawback to the development of southern agricultural prosperity."

Let me add, and also to the development and benefit of the entire Nation, for the resultant prosperity would not be confined to the South. No portion of this country can thrive and prosper without the other portions of the country reaping a benefit; and, on the other hand, no portion can be as much handicapped as the South has been by the cattle tick without the balance of the Union suffering in proportion.

"To the dairyman the tick is as great an enemy as to the beef raiser. Recent experiments have shown that the flow of milk is reduced by ticks by a percentage ranging from 18 to 42 per cent, depending upon the degree of the infestation. The owner of a herd of 20 cows, which should produce 8 quarts per day, will lose, therefore, with milk at 5 cents a quart, from $290 to $670 a year, estimating the milking period for each cow at 200 days in the year. In one case the owner of a herd of 42 cows obtained an increase of 16.6 per cent of his daily yield of milk one week after he began dipping his cattle. He was selling his milk at 35 cents a gallon, so that this meant $3.50 a day additional income as the result of a single dipping in the arsenical solution.

"Such instances as this could be multiplied indefinitely. There is abundance of evidence to show the profit in dollars and cents that comes directly to the farmer from tick eradication, and there is an equal amount of evidence to show the practicability of such eradication. A study of this evidence can not fail to convince even the most skeptical that the tick is to-day one of the greatest and at the same time one of the most unnecessary obstacles in the way of the southern farmer. Its eradication will open the door for an agriculture in which the raising of live stock will play its proper and effective part in the creation of prosperity."

Mr. President and Senators, I now wish to read a very brief extract from the resolutions passed by the great cut-over lands conference held in New Orleans about four weeks ago—a conference representing 85,000,000 acres in the Southern States. It reads as follows:

Whereas in the present national crisis the production of food, especially of meat and dairy products, is of equal importance to the manufacture of munitions of war; the success of the United States and her allies in the great war will largely depend on the maintenance and increase of the supplies of food-producing animals in the United States; the largest area of undeveloped but potentially valuable cattle-producing territory in the country is situated in the Southern States, and the greatest obstacle to the extension of the cattle industry of the South is the Texas fever cattle tick: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the rapid, efficient, and complete eradication of the Texas fever cattle tick has now become a patriotic obligation upon those States comprising within their borders areas still under quarantine; and be it further

Resolved, That this conference urge upon the legislatures of those States which have not already done so to pass without delay State-wide tick-eradication laws, and that the Government of the United States, if necessary as a war measure, exercise the power vested in the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States by act of Congress to facilitate the complete eradication of the Texas fever cattle tick within one year.

I commend that to the careful attention of the Senate.

In conclusion, Mr. President and Senators, let me impress upon the Senate the great importance of this homely, practical, common-sense problem—the production of a greater amount of beef by the eradication of a disease which prevents the successful growing of cattle in a very large portion of our country. Let me remind the Senate that Congress undertook the eradication of this disease 11 years ago, and during the 11 years it has only succeeded in driving it out of 43 per cent of the territory affected. A thing that is worth doing at all is worth doing well, and is worth doing promptly. We have spent $3,000,000 on this work. We have driven the tick out of 43 per cent of the infested area. Let us spend whatever is necessary to drive it out of the remainder of this country, and to drive it out promptly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the very interesting speech which has just been made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]. I was inclined to think before that in some of these appropriations we are duplicating previous appropriations to a greater extent than is necessary, and since listening to the able argument of my distinguished friend from Louisiana I am more convinced of it than ever.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it has not been two months since we appropriated a very large sum of money for the eradication of the tick evil for the fiscal year 1917–18. I call the attention of the Senate to the act of March 4, 1917. On page 5 thereof there is an item reading as follows:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle tick, $631,560.

Mr. President, here we have a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, which has just been read in the Senate, in which he says he can not use any more than that sum of money; that that is all that is necessary. Yet, in the face of this expert advice that the Department of Agriculture can not use more than the $631,560 for the eradication of the tick, we are asked to appropriate in this bill, for this and two other pests and certain other undefined purposes, the enormous sum of $4,500,000.

Why, Senators, have we gone mad? Have we become so excited that we can not act as ordinary business men? I just want to say that I am for any appropriation that will make us more effective in the prosecution of this war and which will add to our beef supply or to our meat supply; but when we have already appropriated by law just passed on March 4, 1917, as much as the department say they can expend, why, in the name of Heaven, should we appropriate an enormous sum like this? How can we use it?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Tennessee says that the Department of Agriculture declares that six hundred and some odd thousand dollars is the total amount the department can judiciously expend for the time being.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; for the year 1917–18.

Mr. STONE. Well, that is for the time being.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir; it may be expressed in that way.

Mr. STONE. It is the period covered by this bill for the eradication of the tick.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. STONE. Then the Senator says that the bill provides an appropriation of $4,500,000 for the eradication of the tick, and also two other pests, and the other incidental purposes mentioned in this section.

Mr. McKELLAR. Hog cholera and contagious abortion of cattle, and the others.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator wants to be fair——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield, and to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri. Then I shall be delighted to yield to the other gentlemen just as soon as he gets through.

Mr. STONE. Yes; but unless I complete my question the Senator can not answer it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely; it was not my fault that the Senator was interrupted.

Mr. STONE. No; it was not the Senator's fault. The Senator says that the bill carries four and a half million dollars for the eradication of the tick evil and two other pest evils. Now, if the Senator has the information, how much of the $4,500,000 would be used to eradicate the tick evil?

Mr. McKELLAR. On last Friday, I think, I asked my esteemed friend from Oklahoma what the figures were and how these very large sums, as they seemed to me, were to be expended. Of course to ordinary people such sums as $4,500,000 do not amount to much; but I am one of those to whom that still seems to be quite a sum, and I asked for the detailed figures, but I have not seen them in the RECORD. I have no doubt that the Senator from Oklahoma will furnish them at the proper time for the enlightenment of the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator, of course.

Mr. GORE. I will say that I put those figures in the RECORD last Saturday, I think, two or three times. In answer to the Senator from Missouri, I will say that the department prepared two separate estimates—one carrying a total of approximately $4,100,000. Out of that sum, if it had been appropriated, $4,000,000 would have been used to eradicate the cattle tick and $500,000 to arrest and control the hog cholera. I have no separate estimate as to the other particular disease. That sum was afterwards cut down in a subsequent estimate to $2,010,000 Now, if $2,010,000 are appropriated, of that sum $182,000 will be used for the eradication of the cattle tick and $231,000 for the arrest and control of the hog cholera. The $4,000,000 is to be devoted to a great variety of different uses, and only those limited amounts to the two objects mentioned.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just one moment I will, because I do not want this to pass over.

This same item appears in the House bill. The House is considering that bill now. The House committee, as I understand, reported something like $2,000,000; and on Saturday, after hearing all the facts, the House cut down the whole appropriation for all the purposes mentioned in the first paragraph of section 7 to $825,000 or thereabouts. With the Secretary of Agriculture sending in here a letter which has been read this morning, addressed to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], saying that they can not use any more than has already been appropriated economically or fairly or so as to better the conditions, I for one am utterly unable to see how we can defend this additional appropriation. The only way in which it can be defended is that we have a war on hand, and it is our duty to spend as much money for each department as possible; that some of the other departments, like the War and Navy Departments, are getting large appropriations, and that therefore we want to pass in with the same lavish hand some of the spoils to the Department of Agriculture.

Senators, as it seems to me, it is important that we should conserve all of our resources. It is our duty to conserve our meat resources and every other one of our food resources; but at the same time we should give just a little attention to the conservation of our money resources, and we ought not to appropriate these immense sums of money when the department comes in, and, desirous as it always is to have larger appropriations, says to us that it can not use these additional appropriations. Under those circumstances do you not think it is our duty to conserve our money resources just a little?

Unless I am greatly mistaken, we are in a long war. We are going to have use for every dollar of our money. We ought to be exceedingly careful how we spend this money. We ought not to spend any sum of money unless there is an apparent reason for it; unless there is a logical reason for it; unless there is an urgent reason for it. We can not defend appropriations like this on the ground that we are in war.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Louisana?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator, with pleasure.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator has repeatedly made the statement that the Department of Agriculture did not want this money. Now, I should like to read what Mr. Rawl, the head of that bureau, said before the Agricultural Committee just a few days ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield just there? The Senator read that statement just a few moments ago, and there is a conflict, as we all know, between Mr. Rawl, whoever he may be—I do not know him—and his chief, Secretary Houston.

Mr. RANSDELL. I propose to read what his chief said, as well as Mr. Rawl said, if the Senator will give me the opportunity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Both have been read this morning.

Mr. RANSDELL. It will not do any harm to read them again. The Senator has said three or four times that the department was against this appropriation. I want to show the Senate that the department is in favor of this appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; I will yield to the Senator to have them read again.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right.

The chairman asked Mr. Rawl:

What is the total for your bureau?

Mr. GORE. That was Mr. LEVER, the chairman of the House committee.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; this is from the House hearings. That is true.

Mr. RAWL. A little more than $4,000,000—I have not the exact totals—including an item of $400,000 for tick eradication and $35,000 for the eradication of dourine.

That is what Mr. Rawl says; and he states further, later on, that that amount is necessary, in his judgment.

Now, here is what Mr. Houston, the Secretary of Agriculture, himself said before the Senate committee on April 23:

Secretary HOUSTON. I said a moment ago that the Bureau of Animal Industry had given me an estimate for increasing meat production of $4,000,000. Only $400,000 of this sum is suggested for the eradication of the cattle tick.

Then he goes on to say:

There are a number of difficulties in the way of large increased expenditures.

Mr. Houston said in the letter to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], which was just read, that he doubted if he could wisely expend this year, in addition to the $631,000, more than $182,000; but he does state there very plainly that that $182,000 can be wisely expended, and possibly they can wisely expend the $400,000.

The Senator has stated several times that this appropriation of $4,500,000 was for the cattle tick and one or two other things. Here is the way it reads——

Mr. McKELLAR. I have read that.

Mr. RANSDELL. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not hear him read this:

For the prevention, control, and eradication of the diseases and pests of live stock—

Thousands of diseases and pests of live stock—

Including hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle; the enlargement of live-stock production; and the conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products.

The Senator, in his extreme fairness, forgot to mention any of those things which are included in this item. As the chairman of the committee suggests, blackleg, tuberculosis, and hundreds of other things, all of the diseases of cattle, come in under that appropriation. It is not confined to the cattle-tick work.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator, in reply to that, all those things have been appropriated for in the current appropriation bill that was passed on March 4 last, less than three months ago.

Now, I want to say another thing in answer to the Senator from Louisiana. He tells us that what has been done in the eradication of the tick has been successful to a very large extent, that we have done away with the cattle tick in Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, largely in Mississippi and Alabama and in Georgia, and to some extent in Louisiana, and altogether, I believe, in California. That was the greater part of the area, he says, infested with ticks.

Mr. RANSDELL. Only 43 per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Forty-three per cent, and our appropriations have increased on this subject. The less territory infested the more money we are asked to appropriate. I think the last appropriation of March 4 was the largest appropriation we ever made—$631,000—and the Secretary of Agriculture stated that that is all that he can use fairly and justly. Why? What is the cause of the emergency? If we had more ticks and cholera in Tennessee and other States, if they were more prevalent there, if we had a report here from the Secretary of Agriculture saying that the cattle industry was going to be ruined and that the cattle were in danger because of not having a great Federal force at work on this subject, there would be some reason for this emergency or war measure granting this large sum for this purpose.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that at the present rate it will require 12 more years to complete the work. There is still subject to the cattle tick an area larger than Germany and France, entailing an annual loss that is estimated at from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and unless I am greatly mistaken our appropriation will continually grow up and be spent as long as the Senator and I are here and probably long after we have been gathered unto our fathers.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask the Senator from Tennessee if I correctly understand the trend of his argument. I hope the Senator is not opposed to the appropriation for the extermination of the tick?

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary; I am very much in favor of it; but while I am in favor of eradicating the tick, I believe we have already appropriated all the money necessary to eradicate the tick next year. I am not in favor of what I believe there is in this bill, namely, an effort to build up an organization in the Department of Agriculture simply because they regard it as a good time to get the money. I do not believe there is any necessity for it, and I say that upon the strength of the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture himself. At this time, when we need every resource we have, when we need every dollar we have to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion, I do not believe that we ought to be voting a million dollars of our money for the eradication of cattle ticks, when we have already voted all the money for that very purpose which the department has asked for. Not a dollar of that enormous sum of $631,000 has yet been spent, and yet the committee wants to give more.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is no difference between the Senator and myself on the question of economy and prudence in the expenditure of public money.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure there is not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But money properly expended for this purpose is not an extravagance. It is not a liability, it is a fine investment, and unless we are going to wage an energetic, relentless war against the cattle tick—a war of extermination—it were better to call off the hounds and quit the chase altogether. Let the work be done effectively or not at all. No half-way or half-hearted work will count for anything in this campaign against the ubiquitous tick. I yield to no Senator in my firm adherence to the idea on and policy of economy. Extravagance in the expenditure of public money is akin to crime, in my judgment; but it is quite as reprehensible to withhold the necessary funds from a righteous cause. I think the error of parsimony is just about as bad as the sin of extravagance.

The sooner this work is completed the less expensive it will be and the more profitable to the American people, because if you do not take up the work and push it through to a successful issue, if you have to stop and wait for another appropriation, then the pest recovers some of the territory from which it has been driven.

I agree, I repeat, with the able Senator that all these things ought to be economically and prudently prosecuted, but the good that will come from the eradication of this pest is almost immeasureable in terms of dollars and cents.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, let us see about what we are doing. Here is the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate and the Committee on Agriculture of the House. Less than three months ago they held hearings where everyone who was interested in this matter came before them. After considering the testimony, they reported out a bill in which they stated how much it would take to eradicate this pest. They had all the hearings before them. Anyone who was interested in the cattle tick, wherever he might come from, had a right to come before those committees. The Department of Agriculture was present by duly constituted officials or agents. After hearing all the proof, the House committee and the Senate committee reported what it would take to eradicate this pest, and after both branches of Congress considered it they agreed upon a bill, and they held that $631,500 would be ample and sufficient means to be placed in the hands of the department to eradicate this pest during the next two years. They asked for it, and we gave it to them; and now, before they have spent a dollar of the $631,500, before they have even gotten ready to spend it, before the law permits them to spend it, under the excuse of a war measure we are asked to make this appropriation. What has the war to do with the cattle tick? Do we have any more cattle ticks because we declared war? Do we have more hog cholera because we have declared war? That idea is absurd. But within two months, without a hearing, without any further information than the committees already have, we are met by the request, not from the department but from certain men in the department, and it resolves itself down to the request of one man in the department. We are asked to make this large additional appropriation. There is only one man, according to the record here, and that is Mr. Rawl, of the department, who is really demanding this large sum, and in this demand he is antagonized by his chief, Secretary Houston.

If it is necessary, I will vote for this appropriation as quickly as any man in this Chamber. I would not hesitate a moment if there was any proof here that it was necessary, that it was needed, that the conditions have changed. If the tick or cholera had appeared in large numbers and where it had not been before, I would vote for it instantly. I would not hesitate to conserve the food resources of our country in every possible way. But I say when a bill is brought in here within two months after the passage of a previous bill for the identical purpose and an appropriation was made that was considered ample at the time, when nothing in the world has transpired to change the circumstances except the declaration of war with Germany, we ought not to spend the Government's funds in such a way as that, and we can not defend it. Whoever is attacked for spending the Government's money in that way can not successfully defend the attack before the people when we go back home, and we ought not to do it.

Mr. President, so much for the cattle tick. I did not intend to speak so long upon it. What I have said in regard to the cattle-tick eradication applies with equal force to the hog cholera. I asked here on Saturday if there has been any more hog cholera since March 4. Here is an enormous sum, a large part of the $2,500,000, that is to be used for the eradication of hog cholera. Do you know how much money we have already authorized to be spent? We authorized on the 4th of March, two months ago, the enormous sum of $3,500,000 for the eradication of hog cholera in this country, one million straight out, and then all the unexpended balance of the previous $2,500,000 appropriation. We have no knowledge whether it has been expended or not, but it is possible under the present law of March 4, 1917, that there can be spent this enormous sum for the eradication of hog cholera.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the eradication of hog cholera. But the first thing we know, we will have built up an organization in the Department of Agriculture bigger than the hog interests. After having appropriated $1,000,000 this year for the eradication of hog cholera and after having given the deaprtment the right to spend all of $2,500,000 that had been previously appropriated if it had not been spent, then, within two months afterwards, without obtaining any new facts, without a hearing, without a report from anybody except some one official down in the Agricultural Department who differs with his chief—they do not even all come here together—they come and ask for their proportion of $4,500,000 more.

Mr. President, I am confident the Senate will never on the showing made here authorize this enormous expenditure for any such purpose, and we ought not to do it. It is a woeful waste, it seems to me, a woeful waste of the people's money, if we agree to it, and I hope the Senate will not agree to it.

Now, Mr. President, one or two other things before I take my seat. I did not intend to talk so long. Listen to this, on page 5 of the bill:

> For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 2 of this act; the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture; and the conservation and utilization of plant products, $2,500,000.

If you buy some seed now, what are you going to do with them? It is too late to get them out among the people to plant. If you hold them over until next year, they will not be worth planting. Seed will deteriorate very quickly in value. What are you going to do with the $2,500,000 to do away with insects on plants. It is nonsense, it seems to me, with all due respect. I do not mean that in any offensive sense; but the idea of spending $2,500,000 of the people's money at the time when we are at war, when we are selling bonds, when we have to borrow enormous sums to carry on the war successfully, we are spending $2,500,000 to look after insects and plant insects, and we do not know what nor where. There are a great many plants in the world. What plant is your investigation going to be used on? Have we any information about it? Not a word.

Two months ago, or a little more, we passed a bill providing for this amount. This is not an original appropriation; this is an additional appropriation; this is a supplemental appropriation. It is not the first money that has been appropriated for this very purpose this very year. It is a war measure. Are you going to have more insects on plants in our country because war has been declared, and have we to appropriate $2,500,000 to meet it? Where are we going to get the money back?

I for one can not vote for that appropriation. I should like to vote for any measure that my distinguished and greatly admired friend from Oklahoma reports out here. I esteem him as much as I esteem any man. I should like to be with the organization always; but I can not go that far. I can not vote to put the people's money on a mission like this. It is asking the Senate more than I can agree to. I can not vote for that provision of the bill. I shall seek to have it stricken out or greatly reduced.

I want to vote for the bill, and unless it is loaded down I am going to vote for it. I think we ought to do everything we can to conserve the food supply of this country in every way, but I do not believe we can conserve the food supply of the country by a willful waste of the people's money on projects like these.

I remember as a boy being told by my mother frequently that a "willful waste made a woeful want," and I will say that if we continue to make this kind of appropriations, these lump-sum appropriations, no man in the Senate can tell where they are going to end. There will be a woeful want of this very money before very many years elapse.

Now, let us take the next item. I am glad to see the last paragraph on page 5, and I heartily concur in it. I think we ought to adopt it, by all means. I think the amount is too much, but we will see about that when we come to it. It reads:

For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents, and others, $3,000,000.

I think the words "and others" ought to be stricken out, but with that exception, while it is an enormous sum—$3,000,000—I am even willing to vote for that part of it, because I believe they are doing good work. I hope, however, the chairman will be willing to reduce the amount. They have an excellent organization, and they are teaching the people of the country how to farm, how to manage cattle and other stock. They are doing excellent work, and I am heartily in favor of that provision and I shall not oppose it, although I will ask the chairman, in the interest of his amendment found on the last page, if the words "and others" ought not to be stricken out?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. That is a general provision under which this money could be spent with profligacy. We ought not to have general provisions in the bill, and before I yield, and I will yield in just a moment, I want to commend most heartily and cordially the Senator from Oklahoma and his committee, which has reported out as an amendment that provision of the bill which is found on page 7 and which is as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to submit to Congress at its regular session in December of each year a detailed report of the expenditure of all moneys herein appropriated.

Mr. President, unless we put some provision like that in this bill, unless when we make this large lump-sum appropriation we then take the bridle off and say to these gentlemen, "Spend the money as you will," we will make ourselves the laughingstock in this country, and we have got to meet it at some time in the future.

Now, I take pleasure in yielding to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee what he means in his reference to the item of appropriation on page 5 of $3,000,000? I understood the Senator to speak approvingly of an appropriation for demonstration work.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I did.

Mr. STERLING. And he was inclined to favor the item on account of that particular feature. I wondered if the Senator's attention had been called to the appropriation in the last Agricultural appropriation act under the head of "States relation service."

Mr. McKELLAR. On what page?

Mr. STERLING. On page 28 of the last appropriation act, where, in the first instance, there is appropriated an item of $720,000, and then on page 29, "for farmers' cooperative demonstration work outside of the cotton belt, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $578,240."

Then in the next paragraph following that there is another item of $659,560.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; my attention has been called to that.

Mr. STERLING. I wondered if it would not occur to the Senator that these items themselves are sufficient to cover all necessary and reasonable demonstration work.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that I rather carefully read the bill passed March 4, and I had noticed those items. Notwithstanding that, I believe that this Congress ought not to leave a stone unturned that will conserve the food resources of our country and add to them.

I have not had a great deal of experience as a farmer, but I have enough of general understanding of the methods employed by the department along this line to know that the Government is doing a splendid work along that line, and it is one that we ought to further.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment. It is one we ought to further in every way we can. We ought to build it up and because it is an emergency and there will be an unusual demand for live stock and all other foodstuffs I am willing to vote for the expenditures, even though I think they are large. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will be willing to reduce it to a reasonable amount, but I am willing even to go beyound what I think is reasonable in order to carry out the policy that we think the Government ought to adopt at this time, and that is to make every dollar more of the farmer's products that we can.

I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma, and I beg pardon for not yielding before.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say in this connection in response to the Senator from South Dakota that at present there are 2,850 counties in the United States, and about two-thirds of those counties are under demonstration work. This increased estimate is designed to extend that service to the remaining 900 or 1,000 counties. I think that accounts for it.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Tennessee will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if through the State instrumentalities themselves a great deal of this work is not being done as to the agricultural products in the several States?

Mr. GORE. I assume now that the State and Federal authorities cooperate in many of these services, and I assume a great many of these services could have been performed by the States alone without any cooperation or assistance on the part of the Federal Government. Of course the whole agricultural establishment and department in the Senator's judgment may be a mistake. But we are committed to that mistake. Of course, we ought not to aggravate it, but I think that whatever we can do to improve the agriculture of this country ought to be done; that it is wise economy, before the emergency taxes are laid upon this country and the farmers pay about 70 per cent of our total national revenue and receive in return a mere trifle. That may suit the Senator from South Dakota; it does not suit me. I think that whatever can be done judiciously to improve and to extend the agricultural interests of this country and to better the condition of the farmers ought to be done.

For my part I am not disposed to haggle about an appropriation of this sort when we have the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture that it can be wisely expended. I deem it wise to defer to his judgment. Of course, I have not had an opportunity to go out and make a survey of each and every farm in the United States; there are some six million of them. I must in a way accept the judgment of others.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree to what the Senator from Oklahoma has so well said about building up the agriculture of this country, especially at the present time. It was that view which I had that leads me to think that I would run the risk of making a mistake, and a very large mistake, if I voted for this appropriation in the bill.

Now, I come to the next provision:

For gathering authoritative information in connection with the demand for and the production, supply, distribution, and utilization of food, and otherwise carrying out the purpose of section 1 of this act; extending and enlarging the market news service; and preventing waste of food in storage, in transit, or held for sale, directing the market movement or distribution of perishable products, and otherwise carrying out the purposes of this act, $2,522,000.

I may vote for that. We are going to have another bill introduced in both Houses in which the food supply is going to be handled in an entirely different way, and it may be that this information might aid and do the country a great deal of good if the other bill is passed. When we are at war we should have a very accurate knowledge of what our food supply is, and I am willing to forego any opposition to this provision of the bill. If it were in time of peace, I most assuredly would be opposed to it. In such a time as this I am willing to vote for it, but I hope the amount will be reduced.

There are other provisions in the bill. I now come to the second paragraph on page 6:

For miscellaneous items, including the salaries of Assistant Secretaries appointed under this act; special work in crop estimating; aiding agencies in the various States in supplying farm labor; enlarging the informational work of the Department of Agriculture; and printing and distributing emergency leaflets, posters, and other publications requiring quick issue or large editions, $1,200,000.

I am opposed to creating new offices at this time. I do not think we need two Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture. Let us see what it means: It just means that there are probably two delightful gentlemen who are getting less than $5,000 and who will be promoted in that department to a salary of $5,000. I doubt the wisdom of increasing these salaries. These men will do the same work whether they are Assistant Secretaries or not. It is just another method of increasing the salaries of men who are probably all right. I do not know who they are; I have no knowledge of that subject at all, but what is the reason for two new Secretaries at this time? What is the work which is to be done? I do not know just who in that department asked for it; I do not know whether the Secretary of Agriculture asked for it or not.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt he has. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that the Secretary of Agriculture made the request for two additional secretaries and I attached additional weight to his recommendation, because last fall I conceived the idea from a consultation with various heads of divisions in the department that there ought to be one additional Assistant Secretary. I took the matter up with Secretary Houston and he advised against it, and said that he would arrange to administer the department without an additional secretary. But further duties have been devolved upon that department, the services are to be expanded, and he has now reached the conclusion that two additional secretaries are necessary. I think the fact that he declined to recommend the proposition in the fall and the fact that he does recommend it now ought to lend additional weight to his judgment and to his recommendation in the premises.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be true. I do not know but that a man who is frank enough to take the two positions at two near-by different times ought to have credit for frankness in so presenting the matter. At the same time the question arises, What evidence have we except the ipse dixit of one man that two additional high officers are required? This is a time when we are asking the country to be saving. We are asking the country to save their food and their raiment, and we are asking the country to economize. Why should we not begin some economy right here?

I think we might cut down salaries rather than raise them. We are obliged to raise an immense amount of money. The gentlemen who are doing the work down there I have no doubt are doing it well; but why could they not serve during this war without any increase in salary or any increase in title? It does seem to me that, upon reflection, the Secretary of Agriculture could get along with his department without having two additional secretaries. I think this whole item ought to go out. To be perfectly frank, I am fair about it, I really think the only two appropriation items that ought to be left in the bill are the item of $3,000,000, at the bottom of page 5, and the item of $2,522,000, at the top of page 6, and both of these ought to be greatly reduced. All the rest of the section, I think, ought to be stricken out. I believe it would be but fair and just to the country at this time; that it would make for the increase and betterment of our agricultural resources not to take, as I understand they propose to do, several thousand young men from the various parts of our country and put them in the department. We had better have those men producing something. They could not produce as much there.

If it is proposed to take them from the farm, we had better leave them on the farm. If it is proposed to take them from other avenues of business, we had better leave them where they are. I do not believe that we ought to go to such an extent in the building up of what is called in departmental phrase "organization." I think we had better proceed as far as we can with the organization we have in the Government departments that are not warlike. Of course, we all know that in the military department of the Government and in the naval department of the Government we shall have to have an immense number of additional employees. That is all right. We ought to let that go and be exceedingly liberal all along the line in those departments; we are in war; but I do not think when we are borrowing money, when we are begging the people to take the bonds of the Government, is the time to increase so largely the organization in the various departments. I do not think it is a time when we ought to be lavish with our expenditures in the other departments of the Government, and especially when the department itself does not come here asking for these very lavish expenditures and when there is a difference of opinion in the department itself. I suppose Mr. Rawl is the head of some bureau down there, and he seems to differ very greatly with his chief. The committee last year seemed to have acted largely on Mr. Rawl's testimony, but they do not seem to have Mr. Rawl's testimony in this case. I believe, in all fairness, that we ought to let them get together. They ought to be willing to get together in recommending these tremendous appropriations of money before we cheerfully give it to them.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. If we go along in this way, the first thing we know we had better merely pass a general law that any department of the Government which wants money can come and get it; take the bridle off, and let them have it as long as it is there. I do not believe in that kind of legislation. I think we ought to know for what purpose money is appropriated. I think we ought to have an estimate of how every dollar of this money is to be expended before we provide that it shall be expended.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I must first yield to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and then I will yield to the Senator from Iowa. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think possibly the question I intended to ask is answered in the last paragraph of the bill. I had not noticed that at the time I rose. I wanted to inquire whether or not these two positions which are to be created by the bill are to be permanent? Of course the bill itself is an emergency measure, but there is nothing in paragraph 3, creating the two Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, to indicate whether or not they were to be permanent officials.

Mr. McKELLAR. Apparently that is obviated in section 8 of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think possibly it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. But I have my doubts about it. We all know whenever we create new offices that they are not going to be abolished. How many offices have we abolished down there? How many offices have we abolished in any of the departments? We are not going to do that. We must look at things just exactly as they are, in a plain, everyday way, as it seems to me. I do not think we ought to make this increase at this time.

Now I yield to the Senator from Iowa, and I beg his pardon for not having yielded before.

Mr. KENYON. I want to suggest to the Senator that the Secretary of Agriculture, as he knows, is now a member of the Council of National Defense.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. KENYON. That is a new duty which has been imposed upon him, and one which requires a great deal of his time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. And the Senator also knows that the Secretary of Agriculture is on the board to locate the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; he has been on that board now for quite a while.

I will say to the Senator, in answer to that suggestion, that we all have additional duties which have been imposed upon us by this emergency. I do not think there is a Senator here whose work has not been doubled and probably trebled. That is one of the fortunes of war. I do not think that a Cabinet officer, any more than a Senator, should complain of additional work which we are obliged to do in this emergency. I think we ought to do such work with pleasure; that we ought to serve the country with pleasure; that we ought not, if an additional duty is imposed upon us, to ask to have an additional officer created to help us or to ask for an additional secretary.

Mr. KENYON. That is true; but there have been great duties placed on the Secretary of Agriculture in the last few years. He has had no increase of his secretarial force since the department was organized. We have placed upon that department the enforcement of some very important statutes—something like 30 Federal statutes—and within the last two years we have placed in that department the enforcement of the cotton-futures act, as the Senator knows; the grain-grading act; and the Federal workhouse act, as I call it—all very important acts. So all that has tremendously increased the work of the Department of Agriculture, besides the war questions that are coming on now. These two secretaries are only temporary secretaries, for section 8 of the bill limits its operation to the time of the war.

I agree with the Senator about an increase in officers, and all that; but I do believe that the Department of Agriculture has such tremendous work upon it that it should have at least one extra secretary, if not two. I am not entirely familiar with the necessities for two, but I am as to one.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator in just one word——

Mr. CALDER rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, let me reply to one at a time, and I will be delighted to yield to the Senator from New York in just a moment.

I will say to the Senator from Iowa that every time we have placed an additional duty on the Secretary of Agriculture or upon any other department—for instance, like dealing with the "cotton-futures" act or any one of the various other acts which have been passed—we have added to his force almost immeasurably. We have an army of clerks and subordinates in every one of the new departments. I see no reason in the world why we should make these increases at this time. Now I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I merely desired the Senator from Tennessee to yield to me in order that I might offer an amendment to the pending bill. The Committee on Commerce, of which I am a Member, is in session, and may be in session all afternoon; so I desire to offer a very slight amendment, to which I think the chairman of the committee will agree without discussion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from New York for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 25, after the word "others," it is proposed to insert:

And for labor necessary to conserve and preserve perishable products of the farm or garden.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, one other matter, and I shall yield the floor. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma especially to the last paragraph of the bill on page 6, which provides:

Such part, not exceeding 5 per cent of any of the foregoing sums as the Secretary of Agriculture may find not to be required for carrying out the purposes of the particular item for which specifically appropriated may, by his order, from time to time, be transferred to any other such item or items, or may be otherwise used for carrying out the purposes of this act, including the payment of such rent, the expense of such printing and publications, and the employment of such agencies in the Department of Agriculture, such persons, and such means, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary.

Does not the Senator from Oklahoma think that that is a very unwise provision to have in this bill or in any other bill? Before the Senator answers, I will illustrate what I am going to say by telling him and the Senate what I think that means. In my part of the country, where cotton is a great staple, men engaged in the cotton business have what they call a "yellow-dog account"; that is, a fund that arises from the sale of cotton samples and various trifles in connection with the business. That "yellow-dog fund" is used for almost any purpose, and sometimes it has been the cause of lawsuits, because officers of cotton companies have frequently misused the "yellow-dog fund" on the ground that it is merely a "pick-up," and that any officer of such a company had the right to use it as he saw fit. Now, when we take 5 per cent of these very large appropriations and turn it over to the Secretary of Agriculture—and that does not necessarily mean the Secretary of Agriculture but it means the various agents of the department—when we take 5 per cent of all these appropriations it amounts to a very large sum of money, and we make of it a "yellow-dog fund"; that is, the department can use it for almost any little thing which may be desired. It may be used for automobiles or it may be used for this, that, or the other thing, which Congress never dreamed they would use it for. It gives them an opportunity, if there is not enough for some purpose in one fund, to take it from another; they can just change it around; and it will be lawful for them to do that, and the account will pass the Comptroller of the Treasury. I do not think that is a good provision; I think it is unwise legislation. I do not think that Congress ought to legislate in that way. We are willing to give the department all they want for whatever purposes are right, but I do not believe in what I am pleased to term "yellow-dog funds." I think it is bad policy to enact such legislation. I think it is a bad practice. I think it will give rise to trouble in the future. I think such methods give rise to large expenditures of public money that ought not to be expended; and I hope the Senator will agree to an amendment to strike that out. I ask him, because I know he is a fair and honest man and wants to do exactly the right thing, in the name of our Government, would it not be better to strike out that particular provision of the bill?

Before I yield to the Senator, I desire to say that I notice originally the bill provided a "yellow-dog fund" of 20 per cent, and I desire to commend the Senator and his committee for cutting it down from 20 per cent to 5 per cent. The only criticism I make, if I may be permitted to criticize for just a moment, is that the committee did not cut it out entirely instead of reducing it to 5 per cent. I repeat, I do not believe in this kind of a fund. I think it is a practice that ought to be frowned upon by the Congress. Surely, if the departments of the Government do not know for what they need money, Congress ought not to appropriate it for them. Now, I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will merely say that I agree with the Senator in the main, with reference to his opposition to lump-fund appropriations. I think it is an unwise policy, and I may say that the committee has for years been converting lump-fund appropriations for the Agricultural Department into specific and detailed appropriations. Owing to circumstances, it is necessary that the Department of Agriculture should have a larger fund than that which is ordinarily given to other departments. They employ a great many scientists. It is not always possible to calculate in advance just the compensation which will be required in that direction, so that they must be allowed more leeway than other departments; but we have been pursuing a fixed, steady, and unvarying policy from lump-fund appropriations to specific appropriations.

As suggested, the committee cut down this item from 20 per cent to 5 per cent. There were members of the committee who desired to limit it as low as 2 per cent. I think it important that there should be some appropriation of this kind for this reason: These are emergency appropriations; that is the theory of the bill. Of course, if the theory of the bill is false the entire legislation is misdirected, but it is not possible to calculate in advance the exact cost of many of these services. Some of them are new services. Finite wisdom can not foresee just what the expenditures will be. It might happen, if the Senator's idea should be adopted in this connection, that some policy, when it was on the eve of completion, would be arrested for the want of sufficient funds to carry it forward. I should think it extremely undesirable to agree to a fixed amount which could not be varied, because it might operate as a stroke of paralysis.

These funds can only be transferred from one of these items to another item, the general purpose being designated in the bill. So far as the amount is concerned, I do not think that is so material as it is that we should, at least, allow some available fund to carry forward this work, if necessary at all, to completion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I totally disagree with the Senator in regard to the necessity for this fund. Congress is in session practically all the time. It has been only about two months since we passed a bill providing virtually for all the items that this bill provides for now, and providing for them liberally, giving the department exactly what they wanted, and yet, two months afterwards the department wants fifteen or twenty million dollars more, and they come here and get it. Are we not going to ask them to come for it? Are we just going to say:

"Take it, without coming for it. Here, we give you a lump sum. You need not come to us in the future; just use it for what you want; just take as much as you want of it. The United States Government is rich. You may not want to use it this year, then use it some other year; you may not want to use it all in the eradication of the cattle tick, then use it for hog cholera; you may not want to use it for hog cholera, then use it for insects injurious to violets or other plants. Use it for any purpose you want, and if you can not find any other purpose for it, you can give some man a job. There are a lot of men in this country who need jobs, and you can help them along by giving them extra jobs. You do not have to make any accounting to us for the money. You have it, and it is interchangeable. Just take it, and use it as you please, and we will try to fix it so that you need not have to bother about it. You can draw on it at will; you do not have to come to Congress; you do not have to make any report as to that fund. We will just give you a general 'yellow-dog fund,' and you can use it at will as long as it holds out; and if it should ever give out, come and ask us for more"?

I do not believe in that kind of legislation. I hope that every appropriating item in this bill will be stricken out except the two that I have mentioned. I want to ask the Senators to seriously consider this. It is not a matter that I have any interest in one way or the other except as a legislator, sworn to do my duty to protect the Government of the United States. I believe that we are about to pass a bill with items of expenditure in it that we ought not to pass. There is no one man in the Senate that is more friendly to the farmers than I am. I was born and reared one. I know all about them. I know all about cattle and ticks, and all of the conditions which have been so graphically described here this afternoon. I repeat, I was reared on a farm and know all about farming, and my every sympathy is with the farmer. I am willing to vote any amount of money that will help build up his interests and build up the interests of the country thereby; but I am not willing just to take off the lock and turn the Treasury over to the Department of Agriculture, and say, "Go as far as you like; there is no limit so far as you are concerned; we will stand by you in an unlimited amount so long as our money holds out." I believe it is an unwise method of legislation. I believe it is an unwise policy, and I sincerely hope the Senate will eliminate the various items in this bill which I have discussed. Senators need not say the farmers want this, for the farmers are not asking for it here. It is the department that is asking, simply to build up its organization.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rather admire the Senator's enthusiasm for economy; but I am sorry that he desires to cut out the first pound from the farmer's heart. It is not the first time that the American farmer has experienced this fate at the hands of his friends. It seems to me that the farmer has more friends before the election and fewer friends after the election than any other class of our citizenship. I suggested a moment ago that before emergency revenue measures were passed it was estimated that the American farmer paid more than 70 per cent of our entire national revenue, and out of the billion dollars so raised he receives something like $20,000,000 for his special improvement and advancement.

Last week we appropriated $3,400,000,000 to exterminate human life. We were driven by an overpowering necessity. Now we higgle about a modest appropriation to exterminate pestilence and disease and to multiply the means of maintaining human life. I wish that economy prevailed in other departments and was not concentrated on the farmer, particularly when it is designed, as this appropriation is designed, to save a loss of from $40,000,000 to $75,000,000 a year by arresting hog cholera, and an annual loss of from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000 by staying the ravages of the cattle tick. What better insurance could possibly be made than to conserve the food supplies of our civilian population and to conserve the food supplies of our military force? I can imagine no more shortsighted policy than that of submitting to these enormous annual losses, instead of meeting our duty as statesmen, arresting these evils, and protecting our people against these incalculable losses.

Mr. President, it seems to be evident that there is a great deal of opposition to the pending appropriation item, and I wish to offer three amendments, which constitute really a whole, to cut down the amount from $4,500,000 to $2,083,000; to strike out the words "including hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle," and then to add, after the sum appropriated, namely, "$2,083,000," the words "of which sum $400,000 shall be available for the eradication of the cattle tick and $500,000 shall be available for the arrest and control of hog cholera."

I move the adoption of those amendments as one amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee how much of that money is supposed to be used for the general purpose of "the enlargement of live-stock production"?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will furnish the Senator an itemized statement in regard to this appropriation. I am not able to answer him offhand.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There is also in the paragraph the general language "conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products." I should like also to know whether or not the committee is able to furnish the Senate with any indication of the specific purposes which are supposed to be cared for under that general language?

Mr. GORE. I will say that information is contained in the document which I have sent to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the pending amendment, as I understand, is the one just offered by the Senator from Oklahoma. That amendment proposes to add, over and above the amount of $1,596,200, which the Secretary of Agriculture claims is all that he as Secretary could use efficiently, $487,000 for the purpose of increasing the estimate of $213,400 made by the Secretary of Agriculture for the eradication of hog cholera and the estimate of $168,900 made by the Secretary of Agriculture for the eradication of the cattle tick.

I take it, Mr. President, that the chairman of the committee has the right to perfect the committee amendment, and I have no objection to having his suggested amendment adopted now in place of the committee amendment, with the understanding, however, that an amendment can be offered to it before the bill leaves the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah ask unanimous consent that that be done?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma be now voted upon, with leave to him to offer an amendment as to the whole section later. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, Mr. GORE moves to disagree to the committee amendment inserting the words "including hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle"——

Mr. SMOOT. And to strike out "$4,500,000" and insert "$2,083,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There seems to be some difference about the matter. Will the Senator from Oklahoma state exactly the amendment?

Mr. GORE. The motion was to strike out the amount "$4,500,000" and insert "$2,083,000"; to strike out the amendment proposed by the committee inserting the words "including hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle," and to add after the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let that be taken up afterwards. The Senate will vote first on the amendment just stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, lines 12 and 13, it is proposed to disagree to the committee amendment, inserting the words "including hog cholera, cattle tick, and contagious abortion of cattle."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment, offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "$4,500,000" and insert "$2,083,000, of which sum $400,000 shall be available for the eradication of the cattle tick and $500,000 shall be available for the prevention, control, and eradication of hog cholera."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I move to strike out "$2,083,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,596,200."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Where does that come in?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "$2,083,000" and insert "$1,596,200."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word. I want it distinctly understood that I am perfectly willing to give to the Secretary of Agriculture every dollar for which he asks for the purposes named in section 7 of the pending bill. In the letter dated May 26, 1917, only last Saturday, and addressed to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] the Secretary of Agriculture sets out in detail just what he wants the money for and how it will be expended, and then states:

> I have some doubt whether, in view of the difficulty of getting a sufficient force of experienced men, of securing the requisite effective cooperation from communities, and of overcoming certain difficulties in the legislation of some States, we could expend efficiently more than the amount of the revised estimates.

The Senator from New Mexico asked how much money would be expended for each of the items named in section 7. From this letter, Mr. President, I will call the Senator's attention to the amounts.

First, the Secretary of Agriculture provides for an extra appropriation for the month of June of this year; or, in other words, he wants an additional appropriation made in this bill in order to force extra work just as soon as the bill becomes a law. Then he asks for an additional appropriation for each of the items in that section for the fiscal year 1918; and the total of all the requests made is $1,596,200—the amount that I have named as an amendment to the total amount provided in the bill.

First, there is the general administration. The Secretary desires an additional appropriation of $5,300 for the month of June, also $62,200 for the fiscal year 1918, or a total of $67,500.

Second, poultry and poultry products, for June of this year, $11,100; for the fiscal year 1918, $133,300; or a total of $144,400.

Third, for the dairy industry, $21,600 for June; $258,600 for the fiscal year 1918; or a total of $280,200.

Animal diseases, exclusive of hog cholera, tick eradication, and dourine, for June, $52,000; for the fiscal year 1918, $625,300; or a total of $677,300.

Eradication of hog cholera, $17,900 for June; $213,400 for the fiscal year 1918; or a total of $231,300.

Eradication of cattle tick, $14,000 for June; $168,900 for the fiscal year 1918; or a total of $182,900.

Eradication of dourine, $1,000 for June; $11,600 for the fiscal year 1918; or a total of $12,600.

Making a total for all purposes, as enumerated in section 7 of the bill, of $1,596,200; and that, Mr. President, is the amount that I have offered in the way of an amendment to the $2,083,000 now provided.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] called attention to the fact that in 1906 the first appropriation was made for the eradication of the tick; and it is well for us to remember that that appropriation carried an amount of only $82,000. The Senator took particular pains to call attention to the fact that there have been, during all the 11 years, but $3,000,000 spent for this purpose. Remember, $3,000,000 for the whole 11 years; and he also said that during that time the tick has been eradicated from a great portion of the tick-infested parts of our country. Now, it is asked, with the appropriation that has already been made, an amount that is more than a third of all that has been appropriated for the whole 11 years, and we are told by the Secretary of Agriculture that it is impossible to use the money efficiently. I am perfectly willing to give to the Secretary of Agriculture every dollar that he says can be efficiently used for that purpose, for I recognize the fact that we ought, in order to conserve the meat products of our country, to get rid of that pest among our cattle.

Why, Mr. President, the House, after this matter was fully discussed, has reduced the amount appropriated in the bill as introduced from $2,010,000 to $825,000 for all purposes, and my amendment carries nearly twice what the House has decided to be the proper amount.

I am not going to criticize the whole bill, Mr. President; but, as I read it, it seems to me that the money that is appropriated can never be expended to the advantage of the American people. Thirteen million dollars! Why, after all the expenses have been paid to carry men to be employed from one end of the country to the other, there will be at least $10,000,000 remaining, an amount sufficient to pay the salaries of an army of 7,000 men. The Secretary of Agriculture has well said that he is in doubt about securing a sufficient force of experienced men to do this work; and I think it is the height of unwisdom to make an appropriation of millions, as we are doing, when a committee of this body at the present time is meeting from early morning till late at night devising means of taxation to pay for these appropriations, and the burdens that will be put on the American people will not be easily met, to say the least.

I know it is very unpopular to fight against increased appropriations. I have almost become discouraged in undertaking to see that economy is exercised by our Government; but I believe it is the duty of us all to know when we appropriate money what it is to be expended for. Why, we are appropriating moneys now by the billions, and millions are scarcely considered worthy of our notice. Anything less than billions the office boy can attend to. While we are spending these billions I think we ought to scan the millions. Therefore I hope the amendment I have offered, or even a lesser amount, will be agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has rather a peculiar idea of economy. He seems to think that it is good economy to lose from forty to one hundred million dollars worth of cattle every year, with steak at 50 cents a pound. The Senator seems to think that it is good economy to lose from forty to seventy-five million dollars worth of hogs annually, when the price of meat and the cost of living are soaring out of the reach of the common man; and yet the Senator insists that these enormous losses are in the interests of economy.

It is estimated that by appropriating three and a half million dollars we could entirely eradicate the cattle tick from the United States and save this annual toll, amounting up to nearly $100,000,000. Now, I think that would be in the interest of economy. I think that would be in the interest of sound public policy, particularly with the grinding of the poor to-day under the increasing prices of foodstuffs.

I saw a pathetic statement in connection with the work of the commission appointed by this city to investigate market conditions in foodstuffs in this city, to the effect that the smaller stores in the poorer communities were no longer selling the better cuts of meat, but were selling inferior cuts. Here in the Capital of the United States the poor are resorting to less and less nutritious food, and yet the Senate of the United States is seriously debating whether we shall save an annual loss of $250,000,000 worth of live stock.

Mr. President, think of the millions of mouths that this would help to satisfy; think of the weapon it would provide to wage war against the wolves of war; and yet Senators insist that we shall not increase a miserable pittance of $480,000. When the farmers pour into the National Treasury a golden stream amounting to six or seven hundred millions annually, yet they shall not receive in return this miserable pittance to increase the welfare of the farmer and to increase the larder and the pantry of the poor; yet in the name of economy we are asked to sacrifice a quarter of a billion dollars worth of foodstuffs annually, taking it from our city population, taking it from our armies in the field.

Mr. President, I would rather have the reputation of eradicating the cattle tick in America than to have the reputation of having taken a fenced city. It has been said that the man who makes two blades of grass grow where only one has grown before is a greater hero than he who wades through slaughter to a throne; and yet we sit here and pare cheese with the American farmer when a quarter of a billion dollars are trembling in the balance, and in the name of economy, in the name of enlightened statesmanship, in the name of a far-sighted policy, we are going to cut down an appropriation of $480,000 to save the Nation incalculable treasures in the way of foodstuffs. We have wasted already almost one-tenth of the amount asked for in our deliberations upon this bill.

I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah will be defeated by the Senate, because the Senate of the United States, it must be said, has dealt more generously with the American farmer than any other branch of the American legislature. I trust that that reputation will not be forfeited on this occasion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] desires to secure a vote upon an amendment that he intends to offer, which carries a smaller amount than the amount named in the amendment I have offered. Such being the case, I now ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment, in order that the Senator from Tennessee may offer his amendment and secure a vote upon it. Of course, if that fails, I shall offer my amendment again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah is withdrawn.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I move to strike out, on page 5, line 16, the figures "$2,083,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$825,000"—the same amount that the House has already appropriated.

Mr. GORE. I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will withhold his motion for a moment.

Mr. GORE. Certainly; if the Senator desires to be heard, I will withhold the motion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I shall support the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee or any other amendment which will cut down the tremendous appropriations which are provided for in this bill. I not only believe they are unnecessary, but I believe the Members of the Senate believe they are unnecessary. I believe there is a disposition here to crowd appropriations upon the consideration of Congress, and, in a sort of hysterical way, denounce anyone who opposes extravagance, and insist that measures be put through here for what I call the looting of the Public Treasury without due consideration or warrant.

I call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to the fact that the regular agricultural appropriation bill, which carried $29,000,000 and over, was only approved by the President March 4. If there was any such urgency as the Senator indicates for spending vast sums of money, why was not the urgency shown at that time? That bill did provide hundreds of thousands of dollars for the eradication of disease. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is authority for the statement that this bill proposes to appropriate even more than the Secretary of Agriculture asked. I call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to the fact that not one dollar of the $29,000,000 provided in the regular appropriation bill, upon which the President's signature is hardly dry, has been expended up to the present time; yet it is proposed to come in here now and appropriate vast other sums of money, when the statement is made upon the floor here that more money is being asked for than the Secretary of Agriculture himself desires, and more than he can wisely expend.

Mr. President, it is a very easy thing to take the attitude that we can cure evils by appropriating money out of the Public Treasury; that we can promote agriculture by putting a lot of people on the pay roll; that we can conserve the supply of food in this country simply by increasing the machinery of the Government. You will not add one dollar to the agricultural products of this year, and we all know it; and it is this year that we are looking out for in this emergency bill. I come from a farming region, and I say to the Senator from Oklahoma that the farmers of the region from which I come are more active in denunciation of extravagance and the increasing of governmental machinery here than they are in condemning men who stand up in opposition to these extravagant appropriations.

It is very evident, from the amendments which have been offered to this bill and from the amendments that the chairman of the committee himself proposes to this bill, that there is no certain or definite knowledge of the amount of money that is required. We are simply getting into the habit, at this special session of Congress, of voting any amount of money that anybody proposes for any particular thing, without any particular or definite idea that it can usefully be used.

I think one of the crying evils of the day, one mistake that we are committing in this extraordinary session of Congress, is the increasing of Government machinery and the appropriating of vast sums of money which the people are required to pay, when there is no definite and certain or reasonable prospect of a corresponding benefit to be derived from them. Let us wait until we have expended some of the money already provided in the Agricultural appropriation bill, that was passed only a few weeks ago, before we undertake to appropriate more out of a Treasury that is now almost empty.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that not one dollar of the money that is already appropriated can be used until the 1st of July, and here we are adding to it in this very large way.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska seems to have forgotten a very important incident in recent history. He chaperoned through this body, I believe, a joint resolution declaring that a state of war existed between this country and the Imperial Government of Germany, involving this country in the worst war in all human history. We appropriated recently—last week, I believe—$3,400,000,000 to carry forward that war to success, an amount approximately equaling the entire cost of the Civil War. I presume the Senator from Nebraska voted for that bill. I assume that he voted for it upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War not upon any intimate and thoroughgoing familiarity derived by his own investigation as to the necessity of those various amounts.

The Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Tennessee either have a great deal more faith in the Secretary of War than they have in the Secretary of Agriculture, or else they do not attach as much importance to agriculture as a foundation of military operations as others of us feel obliged to do. This is supposed to be an emergency measure. It is believed by the Secretary of Agriculture, who is a member of the Council of National Defense, that he can increase the Nation's supply of foodstuffs by the appropriation in this bill. This war is largely a battle of bread. It is a contest between commissaries. Those who have the amplest and most continuous supplies will ultimately be victorious in this contest.

I am not willing to be responsible for fettering the activities of the Department of Agriculture. I am not willing to enlist famine, if you please, among our antagonists.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. If it is to be done, it must be done by others. I am simply undertaking to carry forward the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. I am obliged to take the word of the Secretary as authority. I have not made a personal canvass of the various farms of the United States, and I can not speak of my own knowledge.

I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a few moments ago I asked the chairman of the committee what was intended to be done with this money, and he sent to my desk a statement which he said would show the purposes for which this money is asked. I have looked over this statement; I have added up the figures which I find here, and the total asked for by this statement is $1,596,200.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Now, the committee proposes to appropriate something over $2,000,000.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator please give us some information as to where he expects to use the additional sum?

Mr. GORE. Why, Mr. President, that statement was made time and time again. Once more I will repeat it, and I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] listen.

The original estimate of the Department of Agriculture under this item was approximately $4,100,000. Based on that total, $400,000 would have been available for the eradication of the cattle tick and $500,000 for the prevention of hog cholera. The committee in the House cut down the amount to $2,010,000. Upon that estimate there would have been available $231,000 for hog cholera and $182,000 for the cattle tick. Another and revised estimate, it seems, has now been submitted reducing the total from $2,010,000 down to $1,596,000. The reason for the last figure I am unable to give. I have based my conduct upon the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the statement of Mr. Rawl, who administers this fund, before the House committee.

I have just moved to raise the amount from $1,596,000 to $2,083,000. If that is done, then the various pests and diseases which it is intended to arrest by this section can be cared for; but it restores the amount of $500,000 originally estimated for hog cholera and it restores the amount of $400,000 originally estimated for arresting cattle disease. If this money can not be expended judiciously, of course it will not be expended at all. It will lapse and return to the Treasury. If it can be wisely expended, then there is no expenditure which the Government can make which will bring such vast returns for the amount of the outlay.

I believe it is wise foresight and sound policy to check these diseases even in time of peace, when no emergency exists and when no extraordinary draft upon our food supplies exists. I think it is doubly important to take these steps of conservation when there is such an extraordinary demand upon the supplies of our country and when we confront the prospect of being obliged to deny ourselves our customary rations in order to provide our allies with supplies suitable to enable them to carry forward their arms to victory. Of course, I may be mistaken in this. It is a matter concerning which Senators can easily differ. It is merely a matter of prudence and foresight. I think it ought to be done. Perhaps other Senators think otherwise.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think it would be quite illuminating to a good many if this statement were read, and I ask that it be read by the Secretary. It shows, if I am able to understand it, that all of this money is to be used in the payment of salaries, and the total specified in the statement which will now be read is only $1,596,200. I should like to have the communication read.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if that statement has not been read once this afternoon. My impression is that it has been.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If it has been I have not heard it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the understanding of the Chair that part of the communication has been read this afternoon—not the entire communication. The entire communication will be read, at the request of the Senator from New Mexico.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATEMENT OF PROPOSED ACTIVITIES AND EXPENDITURES UNDER THE BILL (H. R. 4188) FOR STIMULATING AGRICULTURE AND FACILITATING THE DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

"For the prevention, control, eradication of the diseases and pests of live stock, the enlargement of live-stock production, and the conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products" ($2,010,000), $1,596,200.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

General administration: To provide for the supervision of the field forces from the department at Washington, D. C., including necessary clerical and other administrative expenses in connection with the administration of the projects named below, $67,500:

2 dairy manufacturing specialists, at $2,200 each.
1 veterinarian, $1,800.
2 clerks, at $1,400 each.
11 clerks, at $1,200 each.
1 clerk, $1,000.

Poultry and poultry products: To increase the production of poultry and poultry products, which can be brought about by poultry specialists working in conjunction with county agents and other agencies, $144,400.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent that the reading be dispensed with as no one is listening to it. It is merely occupying time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GORE. Will it be satisfactory to the Senator from New Mexico to have the remainder printed in the RECORD?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If I can not get attention to it in any other way, I will read it myself. I think I can perhaps get a little more attention than the reading at the desk. There are some things in it that I believe Senators ought to know.

Mr. BRADY. May I ask the Senator from New Mexico if it is printed in the RECORD, will not that answer his purpose? I believe the Senate should have this information.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I presume the matter will not come to a vote this afternoon, and if that is so I shall not object to having it printed in the RECORD for Senators to see it to-morrow. Unless the matter is coming to a vote this afternoon I would just as soon take that course. I want Senators to understand the number of offices provided for in the bill. One item alone is for 240 veterinarians. The whole thing is simply for the employment of men. How many dairy husbandmen are provided for ought to be known. When you take the whole thing together it only foots up $1,596,000, and every dollar of it is to be expended in the employment of men and the payment of their traveling expenses. Yet, the chairman of the committee asks for over $2,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to withdraw my request for unanimous consent in the interest of saving time. I observe that no one is paying any attention, even to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am very much in favor of the Senate receiving the information contained in the document, and I believe the Senator from New Mexico was entirely right in asking that it be presented. When there were very few Members in the Senate it seemed to me we could gain time and be able to put the facts before the Senate by reading it into the RECORD rather than by simply having the remainder of it printed in the RECORD. I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the reading proceeds, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	James	Overman	Smoot
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Owen	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Sutherland
Curtis	Kellogg	Poindexter	Swanson
Fall	Kenyon	Pomerene	Trammell

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. REED, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WILLIAMS answer to their names when called.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. LODGE, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. PENROSE, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. HARDWICK entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] to strike out "$2,083,000" and insert "$825,000."

Mr. MCKELLAR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There was being read a statement offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] at the time the quorum call was made.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I did not understand that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In view of the fact that a considerable portion of the statement was read when there were only a few Senators present to hear it, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and that I may be permitted to state in substance just what it contains. I think then we can reach a vote upon tabling the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done. If the Secretary will send the paper to me, I will make a very short statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to suggest that the Senator from Oklahoma has announced his purpose to withdraw his motion to table upon the ground that a direct vote would determine the question just as easily as a motion to table.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement. The bill as it came to the Senate provided for an appropriation of $4,500,000 for the prevention, control, and eradication of diseases and pests of live stock, and there was some general provision for the conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy products, and so forth.

I asked the chairman of the committee to give us a statement of the purpose for which this sum of money was to be used. The chairman sent to my desk a table, which I hold in my hand. I have been informed since that this is a later estimate from the Department of Agriculture than had previously been given. This estimate calls for an expenditure of only $1,596,200. In looking it over, I find that practically every dollar of it is to be expended in the employment of additional men, experts along various lines, and some terms are used which I do not fully understand.

I will refer to just some of them. One poultry husbandman, $2,500; 6 poultry husbandmen, at $2,000 each; 1 dairy husbandman, $2,500; 1 dairy manufacturing specialist, $2,500; 2 dairy manufacturing specialists, at $2,200 each; 1 veterinarian, $1,800; 2 clerks, at $1,400 each; 11 clerks, at $1,200 each. Those are to be employed in the department here in Washington.

Then, under the head of "Poultry and poultry products," 45 poultry husbandmen, at $2,000 each. Then, under the head of "Dairy cattle," 4 dairy extension agents, at $1,800 each; 6 veterinary extension agents, at $1,500 each.

Dairy products: Seven dairy husbandmen, at $2,000 each; 7 assistant dairy husbandmen, at $1,620 each; 6 scientific assistants in dairying, at $1,320 each; 7 dairy extension agents, at $1,800 each.

In the cheese industry: Five dairy manufacturing specialists, at $1,800 each; 10 assistant dairy manufacturing specialists, at $1,500 each; 6 scientific assistants, at $1,320 each.

In the skim-milk and buttermilk industry: Twenty-three dairy manufacturing specialists, at $1,800 each.

In the cheese industry: Six dairy manufacturing specialists, at $1,800 each.

Animal diseases: Two hundred and forty veterinarians, at an average salary of $1,800 each; 10 specialists in animal pathology, at $2,500 each.

In the eradication of hog cholera: Ninety veterinarians, at salaries ranging from $1,600 to $1,800 each.

In the eradication of cattle tick: Twenty-five veterinarians, at $1,800 each; 47 agents, at $1,200 each.

Those are the purposes for which this sum of money is asked. It must be borne in mind that this is in addition to the regular Agricultural appropriation bill, which was only passed within the last two or three months, and there is nothing in this estimate of expenditures which indicates the great emergency for which the appropriation is asked.

Has the situation changed as to hog cholera or any other disease of animals? Is there any special reason at this time which did not exist three months ago to develop the cheese industry?

There may be; but, even if that be so, the Agricultural Department itself only made an estimate as to how it can possibly use $1,596,200. Yet the chairman of the committee is asking us to appropriate over $2,000,000.

Mr. BRADY. I should like to ask the Senator before he takes his seat how large an appropriation he thinks should be made?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I must say that I am in the dark, just the same as many other Senators evidently are. I do not believe we have sufficient information here on which to cast an intelligent vote in an appropriation of any sum whatever.

Mr. BRADY. Does not the Senator believe that the information furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture is reliable?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It depends on what he wants to do with the appropriation; but as to the necessity for it there is not a line.

Mr. BRADY. Does the Senator believe that the Secretary of Agriculture would make an estimate for that amount if he did not believe it was necessary?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President. I have great respect for requests from the various departments of the Government, and I have no doubt but what the money could be used in this way, and that it may serve some useful purpose; but I have heard statements made on the floor here as to the amount of money appropriated in the general appropriation bill; and whether they may need 240 veterinarians for the specific purpose named or whether they may need 24 I am sure I am unable to answer.

Mr. BRADY. I fully agree with the Senator that we should economize wherever it is possible to do so. I may say that the statement of the chairman of the committee relative to the addition of $3,000,000 was all the information I had at the time it was presented to the committee as to the amount named in the amendment; but I do think we should give the Secretary of Agriculture at this particular time what he estimates that he should have. I believe that, owing to the present emergency, it is very essential, indeed, that we should encourage agriculture in every possible way, and that we should not try in any way to hinder the splendid work which the Secretary of Agriculture is doing. I know full well that is the intent and purpose of the Senator from New Mexico, and, that being the case, I think we should at least give the amount the Secretary of Agriculture asks in his estimate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I must say that my attention was attracted to this bill by the very general language contained in the bill itself, and on that I formed my chief objection to the bill.

On Saturday at the usual hour when most Senators go to lunch I analyzed in a short way some of the provisions of the bill, and at that time sought to draw out the specific purpose for which this appropriation was asked. But only a few minutes ago were we furnished with any detailed estimate regarding this expenditure. The general language of the bill after naming certain specific purposes for which the appropriation is made says "the enlargement of live-stock production," a most general term. If that is to be used in a generic sense and relate back to the specific purposes preceding it, I see no objection to it; but if it is to be an enlargement of the purposes, and I do not doubt that it is from the language used, then it simply gives carte blanche to the Department of Agriculture to use this money for any purpose whatsoever may be determined to be necessary or advisable for the enlargement of live-stock production. It may be used in the purchase of farms or otherwise.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator think that it is a little late for Congress to be inquiring as to the purpose for which the money is to be employed? Are we not straining at a gnat when we cavil about a few million dollars to be given to the Secretary of Agriculture when we are confronted with a bill sent up here from the department which proposes to appoint a food dictator to fix the price of everything we eat and everything we sell? Does not the Senator think it is rather going back on modern, progressive ideas?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I can only answer that by saying the inference from the question might be applicable to the Senator himself and the older Members of this body, but the newer Members have not been here long enough to come under the criticism which is implied in the Senator's question. I trust that we may profit by the experience of those older in the service.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, he has been talking here, it seems to me, in a strange degree of temerity about the undefined powers, powers that are unlimited being granted by this bill. I wish to ask him what he thinks of this kind of a proposition:

That there is hereby established a governmental control of necessaries, which shall be exercised and administered for the purposes of this act by the President, and which shall extend to and include all necessaries and all the processes, methods, and activities of and for the production, manufacture, procurement, storage, distribution, sale, marketing, pledging, financing, consumption, and use of necessaries; and for the purposes of this act all such processes, methods, and activities are hereby declared to be affected with a public interest?

That section is followed with an absolute power to fix prices and to regulate all of those things. When we are confronted by legislation of that kind why cavil about a few million dollars to be turned over to the Secretary of Agriculture to do with as he sees fit? Why not adopt the philosophy of the Senator from Idaho, that whatever the Secretary of Agriculture asks that, indeed, should be granted, for I understood that to be the amount of his statement?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from New Mexico will yield to me for just a moment, I may say to the Senator from Missouri that this is a case where the Secretary of Agriculture really does not seem to ask it. He is in doubt about whether or not he can use or spend it at all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to state, Mr. President, that the language read by the Senator from Missouri is not found in the bill under consideration. If it were, I should feel quite sure that we would have more Senators in the Chamber considering its provisions than we have here at the present time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to assure the Senator from New Mexico that the Committee on Agriculture has not yet favorably reported the provision which has been read by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I also called attention on Saturday to the language of the next paragraph, which reads:

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 2 of this act; the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture.

That is somewhat specific; we can understand that perfectly, although that is very general language; but when it uses the language "and the conservation and utilization of plant products," I submit that leaves the Senate entirely in the dark. On another page one of the things for which the appropriation is made is, "and otherwise carrying out the purposes of this act." It seems to me that these provisions are entirely too general. When, after coming in with the appropriation of four and one-half million dollars, now cutting it down to something over two million dollars, and then furnishing to the Senate an estimate from the Department of Agriculture that what it now desires to use is only $1,596,200, I must say that I looked with a little surprise when the Senator from Idaho wanted to know whether we could understand how much is needed or what should be done with it.

It seems to me that this measure ought to be very carefully considered. It is an appropriation, it is true, of only about twelve or fifteen million dollars; but that is a good deal of money at this time or at any other time. We ought, as stated by the Senator from Tennessee, to conserve our money resources as well as the other resources of the Government. We want to do all that is necessary, but we do not want to expend any money for purposes which are not in the nature of an emergency. This is an emergency session of Congress. The statement has been made here on the floor that the Agricultural appropriation bill passed last March carried over $600,000 for the eradication of the cattle tick. It was said then that that was all that could be used. So with some of the other items of this bill.

I submit, Mr. President, that the emergency does not appear. Therefore, it seems to me, it is unwise to make any appropriation until the emergency does appear.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment to the committee amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I desire to inquire whether the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withhold my vote in his absence, as I have a pair with that Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce the pair of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], who is absent on official business. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (after having voted in the negative). Upon the theory that a little evil is better than a greater one, I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS], and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], which I desire to transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "yea."

Mr. KNOX. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. KELLOGG] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 24, as follows:

So Mr. MCKELLAR's amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is a part of the amendment agreed to on motion of the Senator from Oklahoma, following the numerals of the appropriation, that ought now to be disagreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rise to ask that that part of the amendment following the sum appropriated be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby that portion of the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered, and the amendment is rejected.

The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "$6,500,000" and to insert "$2,500,000."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to some things in connection with this amendment. This amendment provides an appropriation of $2,500,000—

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 2 of this act; the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture; and the conservation and utilization of plant products.

It seems to me it is wholly unwarranted and that there is no real need for such legislation at this time.

Mr. President, I will not yield to the Senator from Oklahoma or to any other Senator, for that matter, in my interest in the agricultural industry. I know something of that industry. I was raised in it; it formed a great part of my early associations in life, and I am quite in sympathy with everything and every appropriation that is proper and legitimate for the promotion of the welfare and the interest of the farmer; but, Mr. President, I think it quite appropriate that I should call attention right here to appropriations made on March 4 last, the items of which are again covered in this paragraph of the pending bill. They total $680,945. Let me read some of them:

For investigations of plant diseases and pathological collections, including the maintenance of a plant-disease survey, $62,500.

Second:

For the investigation of diseases of cotton, potatoes, truck crops, forage crops, drug and related plants, $87,800, of which sum $5,000 shall be immediately available.

Further on:

For the investigation and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production, and the study of cereal diseases, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases, and for the investigation and improvement of broom corn and methods of broom-corn production, $186,505: Provided, That $40,000 shall be set aside for the study of corn improvement and methods of corn production: Provided, also, That $20,000 shall be set aside for the investigation of the diseases of wheat, oats, and barley known as black rust and stripe rust.

Then comes an appropriation of $56,015—

For sugar-plant investigations, including studies of diseases and the improvement of the beet and beet seed and methods of culture.

And so forth.

Then there is a further appropriation, Mr. President, of $160,000—

For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under subhumid, semiarid, or dry-land conditions.

This same paragraph, which the Senate is now considering, refers also to the eradication of insects. I want to call attention to the appropriations in the Agricultural appropriation bill approved March 4 last, under the heading "Bureau of Entomology." First, I read the following:

For investigations of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, vineyards, and nuts, $83,380: Provided, That $9,600 of said sum shall be available for the investigation of insects affecting the pecan and method of control of same.

Again:

For the investigation of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, * * *

And then:

For investigations of insects affecting truck crops, including insects affecting the potato, sugar beet, cabbage, onion, tomato, beans, peas, * * * $47,760.

So, Mr. President, we have for the very items included within this paragraph appropriating $2,500,000, appropriations already made, which will take effect and be available on the 1st of July next, amounting to $680,000. Where is the need for the additional appropriation of about $2,000,000, and how will it be used?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it involves a possible great waste of money and an unnecessary burden on the people to now appropriate this large sum when it is quite likely that the appropriations already made on the 4th of March last will no more than be used within the next fiscal year and will be as much as can be judiciously and wisely used within that time.

Hence, Mr. President, I for one protest against this additional appropriation. We have seen no estimate for any one of these items. There is none to be found in the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture before the committee, as I understand it, but the committee have assumed to add this large sum here and to ask for an appropriation now. I think, in the face of present conditions, it would be very unwise to make an appropriation of this kind.

One great trouble about the various items in this bill, Mr. President, is that it ignores the initiative, the self-reliance, and the independence of the farmer himself, who ought now, and who, I believe, is willing to relieve the Federal Government of some of the burdens that it has to bear.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to ask the Senator a question. As I understand, he is speaking of the seed provision?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; although I have not yet called attention to that especially.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to ask if it is not now too late to use those seeds for this season?

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator that I think so. So far as the appropriation is meant to cover the purchase and distribution of seed among the farmers, it is wholly useless, and it would be unavailing for the present season.

Mr. LODGE. Would it be of any value to buy the seeds now and hold them over until next year?

Mr. STERLING. None that I can see, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Then, why not strike it all out?

Mr. STERLING. It would seem to me that it would be the part of wisdom to strike it all out. I think it will appear, when this is inquired into, that, so far as the appropriation for seed is concerned, it will be useless for the present year.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will suggest that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] stated on Saturday, I think, that it would not be too late to aid the Southern States of the country, the Atlantic coast section. I imagine that it is not too late to plant there, and that region can add largely to the food supply of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is entirely too late now, for practically all of the crops have been planted in the South. Of course, there are some crops that can be planted a little later, such as corn, but the department never has provided corn for planting generally. Furthermore, it strikes me that it is more likely to be too late for planting in the South than it is in the North where the seasons are late.

Mr. STERLING. I should think so, Mr. President.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, there are some parts of this great country of ours other than the South and the North. In the Great Plains country, in the Central West and the Southwest, crops, such as feterita, milo maize, and kafir corn, which now constitute a great portion of the grain crops for the feeding of animals, and I may also say for the feeding of human beings who eat breakfast foods, are planted as late as June. Furthermore, we raised 22,000,000 pounds of beans in the State of New Mexico last year by dry-land farming. Beans are not planted before the 15th of June, from then until the 1st of July. We raise such crops as are planted about the time the rainy season comes on, and the rainy season comes in July. We have a rainy season——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. Pardon me just a moment. We have a late season there; for the rainy season comes in July and crops, as a general thing, are not harvested until the middle of October. We plant beans in the latter part of June, which gives them time to mature before the frost strikes them. So that, so far as the plains country is concerned, including the States of Kansas, Colorado, and parts of Utah, New Mexico, Arizona, and I may say also a portion of Nevada, if seeds of the character which should be provided to those people were purchased before the 1st of July, they would still reach there in time to be of very great material benefit, particularly in view of proposed legislation looking to opening up the public lands of that section of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] a question. Is there any especial emergency making it essential for the Government to buy seeds for the farmers out in that part of the country?

Mr. FALL. There is this consideration: We have millions and millions of acres of public lands. We are trying to avail ourselves of the act passed by the Congress opening up the western country under the 640-acre homestead act. So far we have been unsuccessful. The State of New Mexico has leased of the State lands 25,000 acres to the farmers of that State, because they can not get homesteads under the act which we passed. They are taking up and planting that land now, and the State legislature has just met and from its funds has appropriated $750,000, is buying the seed, and loaning the people the money to assist them in that State at their own expense to do this thing.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Mississippi will excuse me a moment, the Senator from New Mexico has just made a statement which appeals to me very strongly. In the first place, before seeking the aid of the Federal Government, as is contemplated by this bill, the appeal should be made to the State; but the bill is constructed on altogether a different theory from that, as many agricultural appropriation bills are. They ignore the activities of the State; they ignore the activities of the community and the initiative of individuals and what they might do for themselves in the way of self-help to begin with.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will stay with the Senator from New Mexico on other items of other bills appropriating money directly from the Federal Government whenever they come up, we will have no difficulty in getting together; but this is a different line of attack. This bill itself carries appropriations for use in the States themselves; and the line of attack, as developed here so far, has been simply that the purchase of seed now would be too late. The Senator has public lands in his own State. Certainly those who go upon the public domain and endeavor to cultivate little farms there need assistance if any people in the world ever did. If the purpose of the bill is to vote Federal money for use in any States, then, sir, I think that its use in the public-land States of the West is one of the beneficial purposes to which the money of the Federal Government should be devoted.

Mr. STERLING. I do not deny that in certain limited sections of the Union seed might still be planted, but I do not believe that justifies this Federal appropriation bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. To keep the record entirely straight, I want to say that the statement is altogether erroneous that the crops of the South have all been planted. As a matter of fact, we plant cotton there and make great crops as late as the 15th of June. That is, before the advent of the boll weevil. We plant corn there that yields abundant crops after the 1st of June; but, of course, this bill is not intended to supply that section. There is no widespread scarcity of seed in the South for planting at this time; but this bill is not intended to meet an emergency for the year 1917 exclusively.

This is a war measure, enacted with the view of conserving or promoting the interests of the agriculturists of this entire country during the existence of the war. If the war goes on for 12 months longer, then the provisions of this section of the bill will be needed. As the Senator from New Mexico has said, the whole country now is interested in planting a full crop, and if the States do not do their duty in providing their citizens with seed, it is perfectly proper for the United States Government to come to the rescue. We can not escape the responsibility for failing to do it by saying that it is a matter the respective States should attend to. We need a full crop throughout the entire Republic, and that is the splendid purpose of this section of the bill. This is no time to indulge in constitutional polemics or hair-splitting technicalities. If safely within constitutional limitations, as I am sure we were in the instant case, we should boldly do the thing needful for the public welfare and provide against every possible emergency.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Mississippi, I will say that Congress will convene again next December. If there is any emergency apparent then, an appropriation can be made for the purchase of seed by the Government and the distribution of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But the seed ought to be gotten before that time and stored for use another year.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. My interjection a few moments ago was brought about by the fact that in my State we have possibly more recent settlers on the public domain, or those who are attempting to make homes, than in almost any other State. Large areas of our land have been opened up in one way or another. I have had such demands upon me from New Mexico to secure feterita, kafir corn, milo maize, and other forage-crop plants that I long ago not only exhausted any available supply of my own, but by exchange I secured supplies allotted to other Senators who did not need them, whose constituents did not call for them, and still I am having hundreds of applications that the Government might send out these dry-land seeds. As I say, those are yet to be planted. There is time enough yet to plant them. I am farming in that country myself, and my bean crop will be planted in June, as late as the 27th of June. There are possibly two or three hundred acres of beans not in the ground now at all, but they will be planted by the 27th of June. I may say, if the Senator will allow me, that I am not asking the Government for any beans, but I am stating the situation as it exists.

Mr. STERLING. Let me ask the Senator this question: Having in mind the need or the demand, as he describes it, and the requests that he has had, would he say that an appropriation of this kind by the Federal Government for the purchase and distribution of these seeds would be quite justifiable?

Mr. FALL. I think it would inure to the benefit of the Federal Government as much as anything that could possibly be done; but the Senator is entirely in error in understanding that these seeds are to be given away. This appropriation is made under section 2 of this act, and section 2 provides that they shall be bought by the Government and sold to the farmers for cash at cost.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that now. I have said that a number of times, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. FALL. Then you are not giving my people anything.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if he feels that the purchase of seeds by the Government and their sale to the farmers for cash is a worse proposition than the sending out by Members of Congress of seeds to their constituents absolutely free, at the public expense?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, I think not, perhaps. I think it would be more commendable, probably, that the farmer should buy the seed, if he can, than that he should receive it free.

Mr. KENYON. I thought the Senator would say that. I tried very hard for some years to have the free-seed provision stricken from the Agricultural appropriation bill. I note that in the vote of July 3, 1916, upon my motion to strike it out the Senator from South Dakota voted to retain it.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. So the Senator is in the position of voting in favor of sending out free seeds to the people, but he now takes a position against selling the farmers seeds for cash when they are in distress.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I am not sure but that if the proposition were again before the Senate I would still vote for free seeds, and I would do it because of the great benefit it is to thousands of people in my own State of South Dakota, out in the semiarid region west of the Missouri River, where I have had requests continually coming to me for the free seeds and where they have been of great advantage and benefit to the people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. STERLING. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is not sending out free seeds at the proper time of the year, when the farmers can use them and make them of great benefit to themselves and to the country in the raising of all kinds of crops, a very different proposition from the appropriation now of $2,500,000 to buy seeds at a time when they can not be used?

Mr. STERLING. I think it is quite a different proposition, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. It appears to me, from the argument of the Senator, that he is under the impression that this appropriation is to meet an immediate emergency for this year. Now, that was not the intention of the committee. We did not figure that the war would end this year, but we felt that it would be necessary to prepare for the following year, and for that reason section 8 was added, which says:

> The provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed, the date of which shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the date when this act shall cease to be in effect shall not be later than the beginning of the next fiscal year after the termination, as ascertained by the President, of the present war between the United States and Germany.

We discussed that very fully in the committee; and, if the Senator will notice, we added an amendment, so that it would read, "the beginning of the next fiscal year after the termination of the war." The thought in making this appropriation at this time was that we would secure some seeds for whatever part of the country they could be secured for to advantage this year; but that if the Secretary of Agriculture knew that this appropriation was available—and it will not be used unless the emergency requires it—he would encourage men to raise crops for seed purposes, so that they could be purchased by the farmer in 1918. I hope the Senator will give that matter serious consideration.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. Was the question considered as to the success of the farmers in raising crops during the present year?

Mr. BRADY. That was considered.

Mr. STERLING. Was there any question raised as to whether there might not be seeds in abundance, without the Government going into the business of purchasing seeds and selling them for cash to the farmers? And may I ask the Senator further this question: Could not that better wait until Congress convenes in December, and we know then, at the end of the year, what the crops have been and whether or not seeds have been raised in sufficient quantities?

Mr. BRADY. I will say to the Senator that in the consideration of this matter before the committee there was a large majority of the committee present, and we considered it very carefully and discussed it pro and con, and decided that it was necessary and essential, and agreed to ask the Senate to pass the bill with that section in it. In discussing that matter we thought there might be some question as to how this money should be used and when it should be used, and we also inserted this amendment:

> It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to submit to Congress at its regular session in December of each year—

Now, that anticipates another year—

> a detailed report of the expenditure of all moneys herein appropriated.

In other words, we desired that the Congress should know next year exactly what had been done with this money, for I am frank to say that it was the general opinion of the members of the committee that this war was very likely to continue not only for one year but for two or three years, and we were providing for the future as well as for the present.

Mr. STERLING. But, Mr. President, it seems to me that it is a big appropriation before the ascertainment of the need, and we will not be able to ascertain the real need until the crops of 1917 are harvested and we know whether or not they are abundant and know whether or not there is enough of corn seed throughout the country, whether or not there is enough of wheat seed, and the price at which it can be obtained; whether there is enough of beans and potatoes, and all the varied seeds for the varied food products raised throughout the country. Congress convenes again on the first Monday in next December, and we will then know to a reasonable certainty as to the need on the part of the Government to enter into the business of purchasing seeds and selling them to the farmers.

Now, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator another question. This item covers several things. It is not confined to the purchase of seeds but is, first, "for procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 2 of this act"; second, "the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture"; third, "the conservation and utilization of plant products"; all told, $2,500,000. How much for seeds? How much for the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases? How much for the conservation and utilization of plant products? Was there any estimate made by the committee as to how much for either of these three several purposes?

Mr. BRADY. I will say to the Senator that that very matter was discussed by the committee, and after discussing it we unanimously, I may say, agreed that we would leave the expenditure of this money to the Secretary of Agriculture, to be expended in whatever way he thought was for the best interests of the farmers and the producers of this country; and in order to know just what he did with it, so that we could act intelligently another year, we had the section relative to the accounting inserted.

I will say further to the Senator that he must take this bill as a whole, not any particular section. We were not confining ourselves in that room down there just for pleasure. We were honestly and conscientiously trying to do something that would be of some help in this emergency. There was no disagreement among the committee. There was no misunderstanding as to what we were trying to do. We discussed this matter for days and had hearings upon it and listened to the testimony of Mr. Hoover and Dr. Taylor and the Secretary of Agriculture and a great number of other men, and secured their views. After hearing all their views we then took up the bill as formally reported and cut out over three-fourths of it, and only brought to the Senate what we honestly thought should be passed.

As I said before, the Senator in discussing this matter should be fair——

Mr. STERLING. I want to be fair.

Mr. BRADY. And I will say that I am sure the Senator intends to be fair.

Mr. STERLING. Surely.

Mr. BRADY. For that reason the Senator should consider the bill as a whole. If he will notice, in another section it is said that the Government shall furnish these seeds to the farmer at cost. We had testimony before the committee showing that it was not only a question of the cost of the seed but of the inability of the farmer to secure it, and that the Government could purchase seeds by wholesale, ship them by wholesale to a community, and distribute them at cost, so that they could be had at a reasonable and fair price, and the farmer would be willing to pay for them at that rate even if the Government did not help him. In other words, the testimony before us and the information we received showed that help could be given to the farmer almost as much by the ability of the Government to secure the seeds at wholesale and furnish them to the farmer at wholesale as by furnishing him the money.

This $2,500,000, when you consider it as an emergency measure, and when you consider it in connection with the war, is a very small matter. All of these items that the Senator speaks of, about the prevention, control, and eradication of insect and plant diseases injurious to agriculture, and the conservation and utilization of plant products, are an enlargement of the bill that we formerly passed, that we believed should be made for the reason that the emergency at this time demands it. We must have greater crops. We must encourage production wherever we can. I believe that the man on the farm, the man who produces the crops, is performing a loyal duty and serves his Nation just the same as the man on the firing line, and for that reason I believe that this item of $2,500,000 is a small one.

We vote $5,000,000,000 in bonds; we give a single man authority to sell them under very liberal restrictions, and to say whether they shall bear 3½, 4, or 5 per cent interest, when that will make millions and hundreds of millions of dollars' difference to the taxpayers of this country; yet here is an item of $2,500,000 scatterel over the United States for the purpose of helping to eradicate insects and diseases injurious to agriculture and for the conservation and utilization of plant products. It is a commendable purpose; and I may say, in closing my very lengthy answer to the Senator, that that very section was adopted after a long and earnest discussion by the committee and cut down from $6,500,000 to $2,500,000. I believe, in all fairness, that that amount could be advantageously used.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think I might take issue with the Senator from Idaho, so far as considering this bill as a whole is concerned, except that the part of section 2 that relates to the furnishing of seeds to the farmers for cash at cost might by implication be carried over to this paragraph. But each one of these items stands, so far as that is concerned, as a separate and independent proposition, as a separate bill, and you can not read into this particular paragraph anything else concerning any of these items, except that part of section 2 that relates to the sale to the farmer at cost and for cash of the seeds that the Government furnishes.

Mr. BRADY. If the Senator will permit me just one moment more, we discussed the question of whether the Government should sell those seeds to the farmer on time or for cash, and it was agreed that it was a sufficient accommodation to the farmer to receive the seeds, and that he would be ready to pay cash for them in case he did receive them; so we do not lose this money. Every dollar of it will be paid back to the Government the minute the seeds are delivered to the farmer.

Mr. STERLING. Just a further word, Mr. President, in regard to this appropriation and the need of making it now. Referring back to the appropriations made for the investigation of plant diseases, for the eradication of insects, and so forth, amounting in the aggregate to $680,945, not one cent of which is available until the 1st of July next, it seems to me that an appropriation here of $2,500,000 for these three purposes, without any knowledge whatever as to how much of that $2,500,000 will be devoted to any one of the three, and without knowledge as to the needs of any, would be a most unwise and improvident thing for the Congress to do.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator says that he thinks it would be an unwise investment. It is not really an investment; it is simply a loan of the money. That is, I mean, it is not a permanent investment.

Mr. STERLING. The question is whether there will be a need of the loan of the money or not. That is the very point in dispute between myself and the Senator from Idaho. I say you will not know how much of the $2,500,000 will be needed for expenditure for that particular purpose until the crops of 1917 are harvested; and there will be ample time then, when we ascertain what the emergency is, to meet the emergency.

Mr. BRADY. We appropriated $50,000,000 the other day to buy ships.

Mr. STERLING. Because there was an emergency.

Mr. BRADY. Is there any reason to suppose that we will have to spend all that money for the purchase of ships?

Mr. STERLING. It is known that there is an emergency existing—a present emergency. We do not know whether there will be an emergency a year hence or not for the purchase of these seeds.

Mr. BRADY. Does the Senator mean to say that there is no emergency existing for the purpose of raising crops?

Mr. STERLING. Not this year, so far as pertains to the purchase of seeds by the Government and selling them to the farmers. There has been the rather isolated case suggested by the Senator from New Mexico a while ago, where forage crops of certain kinds are yet to be raised, or may yet be sown or planted; but the great part of the crops in the South are planted already. I think that is admitted. Away in the Northwest, in my own State, I do not know of any seeds that could be furnished now by the Department of Agriculture that would benefit our section of the Union. The corn and the wheat, the oats and the barley, and the potatoes are all planted, or will have been by the time this proposed appropriation could be made available, the seeds purchased and sent to the farmers.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I want to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota if he knows of any good reason why the National Government should be furnishing seed to the farmers of South Dakota, even if the planting season had not ended?

Mr. STERLING. I do not.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator have any kind of an idea that the Government could buy seed and furnish it to the farmers out there cheaper than they could themselves get it on the market?

Mr. STERLING. I have not, nor do I see any reason why it could.

Mr. WALSH. Can the Senator from South Dakota tell us whether they have experienced any difficulty in getting seed in South Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. I have not heard of any.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. If the question just asked by the distinguished Senator from Montana has anything in the world to it, then abolish your Agricultural Department. If the object of this bill is in any way to help the consumer and the producer, this is one of the objects, because the Government is going to put its machinery to work. I am not interested in this; I do not care particularly about it; but the idea of the Senator asking a question of that kind is so preposterous to me, in view of the general tenor of the bill itself, that it answers itself; and the Senator from South Dakota agrees with him, when the proposition is not, if the Senator had noticed, to buy the seed and give it to the farmers. It is for the Government to buy it and sell it to the farmers. The Senator is perfectly aware that there is another bill, a companion bill, which the administration is insisting on going along with this, now being considered in the House. This is one of a series of bills. Under the other bill, particularly, the Government of the United States is provided to be not only the purchaser but the seller of all these seeds and of all the farming products. If the Government of the United States, through its machinery, can purchase seed and furnish them where they are wanted at cost to farmers who are not able to purchase them in their local markets, it is the business of the Government of the United States to do it, or else it should abolish its Agricultural Department and pass no more agricultural appropriation bills.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from South Dakota will indulge me a little further. I think that the continued existence of the Agricultural Department and the voting of this appropriation to buy seed by no means run together. We voted an appropriation of some $29,000,000 in the month of March last to keep the Agricultural Department going. I voted very cheerfully for that and for every other general appropriation bill for the Agricultural Department. I do not like to have the Senator from New Mexico put me in the attitude of advocating the abolition of the Agricultural Department because I do not see any occasion for this appropriation.

But I wanted to make an inquiry of the Senator from New Mexico, if the Senator from South Dakota will pardon me. The Senator from New Mexico told us a little while ago that seeding time has not yet gone by in his State. It is not complete, either, in my State. However, I should like to learn from the Senator from New Mexico whether there are conditions in his State which seem to call for this legislation. What particular seed or seeds are still necessary in the State of New Mexico which ought to be furnished by the Government to the farmers of that State rather than be matured by them in the usual way?

Mr. FALL. The Senator evidently has not paid any attention to what I have said heretofore.

Mr. WALSH. On the contrary, Mr. President, I was paying very close attention to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I mentioned, and I will mention again, that as late as the latter part of June in various of the Southwestern States they yet plant what is known as the native pinto bean and the frijole, or Mexican red bean, on the dry land, because the rainy season is supposed to start on the great plateaus about the 24th of June.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I followed his statement.

Mr. FALL. Let me answer the Senator's question. The forage crops which are provided to be raised under the 640-acre homestead law which was passed in December, the forage crops as we know them in the entire southwestern country, consist of different varieties of kafir, milo maize, and feterita. If the frost holds off until the 20th day of October, as it does in southern New Mexico and in southern Arizona, for example, then planting can be successfully made even in the latter part of June. Some of those crops, and particularly feterita and white milo maize, will yet mature a grain crop, and if not, they will produce a large forage crop in that part of the country. Therefore seeds available at all even by the latter part of June are of use in that portion of the country.

The Senator is asking as to the necessity of the farmer to have the seed. The old farmers in that country raise their crops entirely by——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, that is not the question I raised at all. I followed the Senator very carefully.

Mr. FALL. What is it the Senator asked? He asked me whether there was any necessity for it.

Mr. WALSH. Not any necessity for the seed. The Senator is going on to tell me about the necessity for the seed. That is not the question I asked him. I asked him if there are any conditions in his State that make it necessary or advisable for the United States to go in and buy the seed and sell it to the farmers for cash rather than have the farmers purchase the seed?

Mr. FALL. The Senator is always able to explain his question, and is always desirous of explaining his answer, but when he asks a question he wants an answer yes or no without an explanation.

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. FALL. I will proceed to answer the Senator's question if the Senator from South Dakota will allow me to presume on his time.

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. FALL. The old farmers in our portion of the country raise their crops by irrigation. Recently there have been something like 3,000 applications in New Mexico made under the 640-acre homestead act. An attempt is being made to secure the use of those lands through action by the Secretary of the Interior so that a crop can be planted this year. People from Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, and from other portions of the country have leased 25,000 acres of land from the State. They would like to raise these crops, but there is a shortage of beans and feteritas in New Mexico. There is not sufficient to supply the demand. I presume if those people had plenty of money and were located where they could earn daily wages they might be able to send off to some company and purchase those seeds, if the Government had not secured them. The Government is constantly in the market for seed. As soon as those people know that the Government has seed for sale at cash they will buy them. I will guarantee that New Mexico would take $250,000 worth of those seeds right now.

As I said to the Senator, as further showing the necessity for this, the State of New Mexico itself has appropriated $750,000 for the same end. The State, however, would loan the farmers the money which they would pay the Government of the United States for the seed.

Mr. WALSH. That is exactly the point that I am directing the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to. This provision does not propose to loan a dollar to anybody.

Mr. FALL. I understand that.

Mr. WALSH. It proposes that the United States shall go out and by these seed and sell the seed for cash to the farmer. The question I addressed to the Senator he has not answered at all, namely, Why does not the farmer go out into the market and himself buy seed?

Mr. FALL. The Senator is so obtuse, I presume, that he can not understand the Senator, and he is unfortunate in not being able to understand the Senator from Montana. I have thrown as much light on this particular phase of the case as I can.

Mr. WALSH. I had a suspicion that there was not any very good answer to it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to add this to the suggestion of the Senator from Montana: If the individual farmer himself has difficulty in finding out where the seeds are to be purchased, I wonder that there are not public agencies in the State of New Mexico that would help the farmers of New Mexico in the matter.

Mr. FALL. The State of New Mexico is one of the States of the Union—not your State, but my State—which called a special session of the legislature, and, poor as we are, appropriated money not only to help our people but they appointed a war council which is in daily communication with the branches of this Government and is pronounced by your Agricultural Department and Mr. Hoover and his committee to be the one State, with the exception of Iowa, which has perfected any kind of an organization which amounts to anything. As poor as we are and as much restricted as we are by the Government restrictions, we are spending our money and we are not asking you to give us a cent. New Mexico is asking nothing of you.

Mr. STERLING. Then, so far as New Mexico is concerned, there is no need for this appropriation.

Mr. FALL. There is need for it for the reason given, which any man ought to understand, it seems to me. The Government of the United States being a great purchaser in the market has facilities for purchasing stuff needed which the individual farmer in New Mexico has not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield, that I may suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that the Government of the United States, through its Agricultural Department, reaches every section of every State in the Union? They know just exactly what seeds there are and at what prices they can be procured. They have the information, and they have the facilities to obtain any quantity of seed needed in any other part of the country—facilities that no State and no business organization has.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to suggest this question? Then if there is a cooperation between the Federal Government and the State of New Mexico, as suggested by the Senator from New Mexico, why can not the authorities in New Mexico obtain the information and the help that will enable them to buy seeds for their farmers?

Mr. FALL. When the question comes up on the Agricultural appropriation bill generally, I propose to enlighten the Senator from South Dakota, if I am alive at that time, about some of the items which go into his State, particularly for the benefit of the people of his State. All the seeds for every one of the crops that I have mentioned, with the exception of native beans, have been bought by the United States at an immense cost from Afghanistan, from India, from China, from the far reaches of the globe. They have been introduced here and have been sent out to the western country, and they have been experimented with there by farmers in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture. The Department of Agriculture is doing a magnificent work. The work that it has done in the South, which is so often referred to here, has been of inestimable value, just as in your State and in mine. But there are peculiar conditions. The conditions in different States are not the same. As I attempted to explain to the Senate when the Senator was insisting on the passage of the 640-acre homestead act, it can not apply as written to my State; it can not apply to relieve the conditions I am now undertaking to explain, but the provisions of that act could be availed of and be of wonderful benefit to the central and southwestern part of the country. The balance of the country has not received any benefit.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word. I and other Senators have occupied more time than I intended.

Mr. HUSTING. Before the Senator leaves this question, I wish to say that, as far as Wisconsin is concerned, we have not by any means planted our potatoes, and we will still plant in the month of June. I doubt very much whether the corn is planted, owing to the backward weather we have been having;

and in view of the very heavy frost we had in Wisconsin I believe we will have to reseed at least a part of our ground. Of course time is passing, and if the consideration of this bill is going to last any great amount of time longer, it will not be of any service to the farmers for the coming season.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if, notwithstanding there is not yet time to procure the seed necessary, it can not be done through agencies within the State without an appropriation in the first instance by the Federal Government? That is the question.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to say, if the Senator will permit me, that the farmers have found it necessary in that part of the country to use the medium of men not engaged in the seed business at all, editors of papers and the like. They have tried to mobilize the seed supply of the State through the newspaper agencies. In other words, there has been a necessity to supply the farmers with seed. The seed is not there to take care of an emergency situation like the present.

Mr. STERLING. Just this word, Mr. President: I do not want to be understood for a moment as depreciating the work of that great department, the Department of Agriculture. It has done and is continually doing a splendid work. I acknowledge the benefit of that work in my own State of South Dakota. But, Mr. President, I acknowledge also benefits done by the agencies within the State, the agricultural colleges and the State authorities, and what has resulted from the individual initiative and enterprise of individuals, of communities, and of State authorties generally.

I think we ought to observe that principle a little more in our legislation. I do not want to vote against anything that I believe will be for the real welfare and interest of the farmers, but I can not yet appreciate the need of $2,500,000 appropriated in this bill for these several purposes. It has led to a discussion of the seed question, as though it was in the minds of Senators that a great part of the appropriation of $2,500,000 would be expended for seed. Next December we will know what are the real needs of the country in that respect, and we can then govern ourselves and appropriate accordingly.

It seems to me that an appropriation such as this would be ill advised for seed purposes, and, as we have already seen, there are ample provisions in appropriations already made for the other items in this one paragraph of the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have looked over the report of this bill and have found no specific information regarding its items. I inquired whether there has been any communication to the Secretary of Agriculture on the subject and was handed a letter of May 22, 1917, directed to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, which contains a lengthy statement of some 30 pages in detail of the proposed activities and expenditures under the bill, for stimulating agriculture and for the distribution of agricultural products. It contains an index of the items under the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Bureau of Plant Industry, Bureau of Entomology, State Relations Service, and so forth. It seems to me it is a summary full of great value in this debate, and I would ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it would not be advisable to have this statement printed in the RECORD or printed as a public document for the use of the Senate. I will first inquire whether it has already been printed?

Mr. GORE. I did not understand the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I asked whether the communication addressed to the Senator from Oklahoma by the Secretary of Agriculture dated May 22, 1917, explanatory of the items regarding proposed activities of the Agricultural Department has been printed either in the RECORD or as a public document?

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] put it in the RECORD. I called attention to it and stated that it would be read into the RECORD if anyone desired. There was no wish expressed at that time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I inquire of the Senator from New Mexico whether this was the statement?

Mr. GORE. I ought to state to the Senator from Nevada that the Secretary of Agriculture appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and made a statement which has been printed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I observe it here in the report. It is contained in a volume of probably some five or six hundred pages. So far as I am concerned, I am disposed to follow the judgment of the Committee on Agriculture upon this matter, but there seems to be so much disposition to contest the various items and in view of the very meager information and the complaint made of the information furnished by the department, it seems to me that this document ought to be printed. I do not understand that the Senator from New Mexico had read the entire communication. Has the Senator any objection to having it published in the RECORD?

Mr. GORE. None whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The Senator from Nevada requests that the statement be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let it be printed at the Government Printing Office as a document for the use of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks that it be printed as a public document. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to having it printed as a Senate document. We would have to send it, all but a few copies, to the libraries of the country and to all the departments of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. GORE. I will state to the Senator from Nevada that I will have a committee print made.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all that is necessary.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. BRADY. I think that the document should be printed, and I hope some arrangement will be made by which it will be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture says he will have the document printed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move to strike out that part of the bill beginning on line 17 and ending with "$2,500,000," on line 21, page 5. I do not want to discuss it this afternoon, and I hope the Senate will not proceed further with the bill to-night.

Mr. BRADY and Mr. MARTIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Chair recognizes any other Senator he will state that there is an amendment now before the Senate on which a vote was taken but no result was declared, the Chair is informed, and perhaps that question had better be finished before taking up another.

Mr. McKELLAR. What amendment was that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What was the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that a vote was taken on the committee amendment, in line 21, page 5, but the result of the vote was not announced.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is a mistake. Before the vote was completed it was suggested that there was an objection to the vote, as there was a desire to amend the committee amendment. I do not think it would be fair to the balance of the Senate to have it announced that the committee amendment was adopted. I think there were Senators upon their feet who desired to object to the committee amendment, and the vote was not announced, in deference to the desire expressed, the Chair feeling that it would not be fair to the Senate to allow it to come to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is exactly what the Chair undertook to say. We will have to take another vote on this proposition. The present occupant of the chair, of course, can not rule whether the vote carried the amendment or not, because he was not then in the chair. Therefore the vote will have to be taken over again.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 29, 1917, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 28, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, Author of life and thought and action, impart unto us life more abundantly, and give us wisdom that we may think clearly and act in consonance with the eternal fitness of things and meet the test through which we are passing calmly, with a firm resolve to do our part in regenerating the conditions of the world with a view of making it a safer place to live in and advance to larger life in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, May 26, 1917, was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. CLARK of Florida, reference of House joint resolution 94, authorizing the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to permit the Secretary of War to erect temporary buildings in the Smithsonian grounds, was changed from the Committee on the Library to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

UNIFORMS OF UNITED STATES EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising this morning is in reference to a newspaper article, which probably all of you read, appearing in yesterday morning's Washington Post, which contained a statement that from somewhere, from some Army headquarters, an order had gone out that the American troops about to be sent to France were to be uniformed in the uniforms of the Canadian militia. That statement, if true, in my judgment, would be unwise, unpatriotic, and unjust to our American boys serving with the flag. [Applause.] This morning I called up Gen. Bliss, of the War Department, and he stated to me that that report was absolutely without foundation and that no order to that effect had been given. I merely desire to lay these facts before the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Did Gen. Bliss indicate further that no such order would be made?

Mr. HICKS. That I did not ask him, but I imagine that he would not sanction anything of that kind.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I trust that is the situation.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

The question was taken.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ADAMSON (interrupting the call). Mr. Speaker, I understand there is an issue pending—a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. ADAMSON. But we did vote.

The SPEAKER. The vote had already been taken.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman made the point upon the vote that there was no quorum present, and he was up trying to make it and did make it upon that vote.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House has been ordered, and the Clerk is calling the roll.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand; but the gentleman from Illinois was up making the point of order that there was no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's point comes too late for one thing, and, in the second place, we will accomplish the same purpose by calling the roll. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to announce the absence of Representative MASON owing to illness.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MASON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter, which I have received from the Secretary of State inclosing a note from the Danish minister to this country in reference to the exports of food from Denmark to Germany during the war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the correspondence referred to:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 23, 1917.

The Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose for your information a copy of a note dated May 16, 1917, from the Danish minister at Washington relative to the attitude of the press in certain European cities, and the consequent misunderstandings that have arisen in the United States in regard to the amount of exports of food from Denmark to Germany during the war.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ROBERT LANSING.

(Copy of note from Danish minister.)

THE DANISH LEGATION,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1917.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: You are no doubt aware that for some considerable time certain newspapers in Europe, more particularly the London Morning Post and the Paris Echo de Paris, have at intervals directed a veritable campaign of suspicion and accusation against Denmark, alleging on the strength of incorrect and incomplete statistics and of unwarranted conclusions, that during the whole of the present war Denmark had, to the loss and detriment of the allies, carried on an important and lucrative trade with Germany, especially in articles of food. This campaign has in part been taken up by certain newspapers in this country, and in my personal experience the belief is very general here, that there is a considerable foundation of truth in these newspaper statements.

I have, of course, not neglected to inform the Danish Government of these conditions here, calling attention to the danger that, if the erroneous statements and conclusions were not contradicted with the necessary authority and weight, they might be considered as giving a true and exact description of the situation even by the Government and Congress of the United States.

I have reason to believe that as a consequence of my reports the Danish Government will shortly send to this country certain experts thoroughly acquainted with the conditions of export and import in Denmark, and who will remain here at least temporarily in order to meet questions of this nature when they arise, and of this mission I shall have the honor to transmit further information to you as soon as I hear definitely from Copenhagen.

Meantime, by a cablegram received yesterday the Danish Minister of Foreign Affairs has informed me as follows:

The London Morning Post and the Paris Echo de Paris continue their agitation against Denmark by publishing the following figures of export from Denmark to Germany in 1916 and 1913:

1913.	Tons.
Bacon (pork)	1,448
Lard	3,341
Other fats	106
Preserved meats	113
1916.
Bacon	14,280
Lard	96,720
Other fats	72
Preserved meats	100,800

The correct figures are the following:

1913.	Tons.
Bacon	2,100
Lard	3,341
Other fats	1,695
Preserved meats	113

1916.

Bacon	19,483
Lard	6,266
Other fats	2,542
Preserved meats	14,566

As you will perceive, Mr. Secretary of State, the figures published by the two newspapers in question are, on important points, as compared with the Danish official statistics, very far from exact and in some cases vastly exaggerated. But it is of no less gravity that the said papers leave out of consideration, therefore, the size and resources of our country truly enormous supplies of food which at all times, and also during this war, Denmark has constantly sent to Great Britain.

The figures of this trade will later be placed before you, if you so wish, and I may add that in the cablegram above referred to the Danish minister of foreign affairs states that in 1916 alone Denmark exported to Great Britain 84,801 tons of bacon.

In this connection I beg leave to call attention to the debate in the British Parliament on March 27 last, of which I inclose a copy from the London Times of March 28, and more particularly to the statements made in the House of Commons on that day by Lord Robert Cecil, the blockade minister of Great Britain, regarding the strict compliance of Denmark with all the requirements of neutrality and of certain special undertakings relating to imports and exports.

Lord Robert Cecil summed up his remarks concerning Denmark by saying:

"It has been suggested that Denmark has been guilty of great delinquencies as regards ourselves. I know that that has been very much resented in Denmark. I wish to say, speaking for the British Government, that I make no such charge against Denmark at all. I remember the Danish agreement and the campaign then set on foot and I can only say that that agreement has been carried out with admirable fidelity by the Danish parties to it. I believe that it has proved exceedingly useful and that it has been well observed by the whole Danish population with very few exceptions. It has been suggested that even if that be true of the first Danish agreement, there is some other agreement into which Denmark has entered which she has not kept. So far as Denmark is concerned—I am not speaking of Holland—there has been no agreement with respect to agricultural products. Both sides, we as well as Denmark, are perfectly free in the matter. Discussions have certainly taken place and assurances have certainly been given, but I desire to say, with the utmost emphasis that in my judgment the Danes whenever they have given us any assurances have endeavored honestly and honorably to fulfill them. For these reasons, so far as Denmark is concerned, I am authorized by His Majesty's Government to say, after full consideration of all the aspects, that they do not see any reason to modify their present blockade policy with respect to that country."

A more unreserved and complete contradiction of all the incorrect newspaper statements in question and a more full acknowledgment of the conscientiousness with which Denmark has under the great difficulties, and with due regard for its own national life and existence, carried out the impartial neutrality of the country toward all the belligerents could hardly be looked for or, indeed, conceived.

The Danish minister of foreign affairs has directed me to place these statements before you, in order that the American Government may from authentic sources have correct information of the conditions to which I have alluded, and in carrying out my instructions I venture to ask that you will be pleased to convey information of the contents of my present note to all departments of the Government of the United States which are concerned in this matter, including also the Council of National Defense and its committee on food control and supply, and furthermore to the two Houses of the Congress of the United States, who as well in the open daily meetings as in meetings of the competent committees have recently had occasion to discuss the questions alluded to in my present note.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest consideration,
Your most obedient and humble servant,

C. BRUN.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the Klamath Bird Reservation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The SPEAKER. The House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4188, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last Saturday there was an amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], and also an amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. Unanimous-consent agreement had been made to finish the debate on the paragraph under consideration and all amendments thereto in 35 minutes, I believe, and there were 20 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserved the point of order to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. There are 20 minutes remaining for debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman from South Carolina proceeding under the reservation of the point of order, but it strikes me that it might be desirable to dispose of the point of order immediately. Therefore I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is not in order on this paragraph.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield to me just a moment?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Is that a point of order against the simple motion to strike out?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is the only motion pending. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota to state the ground for the point of order against the motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] to make the point of order to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina to strike out certain words in the paragraph?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I make the point of order to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota want to be heard?

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I very readily admit that upon the face of things the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is apparently in order, but in order to determine whether it is in fact in order or not we must have recourse to the entire bill and to the effect which the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina will have on the entire bill and the section to which it relates. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into with respect to the consideration of the appropriation items in this bill. My contention is that section 9 of this bill relates solely to appropriations; that legislative provisions are not in order as amendment to it; that they should be considered, and, under unanimous-consent agreement of Saturday, must be considered, in the light of a general appropriation bill. I call the attention of the Chair to the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into on Saturday. The Chair will find it on page 2947 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It says:

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this portion of the bill—

That is, the portion relating to appropriations—be considered under the rule governing appropriation bills, and that amendment be offered at the end of the paragraph.

The Chair did not put the question in exactly the form submitted by the gentleman from Iowa. But if the request made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] was the request upon which the committee acted on Saturday, the committee is now considering the appropriation sections of the bill under the rules governing appropriations, and it would not be in order as to any section to offer an amendment changing existing law, or to amend the section so that as amended it would change existing law. Now, under existing law the increasing of food production and eliminating waste by educational and demonstrational methods are obviously in order. But if the language "and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods" is eliminated, that will leave simply the language "for increasing food production and eliminating waste."

Now, that language obviously contemplates and authorizes the doing of things which are not authorized by law. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] himself contends that if that language remains in the bill it will authorize the addition of a paragraph which makes new law, and if it does it is new law standing alone. My contention is that the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is not in order because in effect it changes an appropriating section in such a way as to make it new law.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, just a moment in that connection. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] I think entirely misapprehends the agreement to which he refers. There was no agreement to consider this as an appropriation bill, but the understanding was that the analogy of a general appropriation bill should be pursued with respect to reading, and considering of this section by paragraphs. That was all; merely for the purposes of convenience; it was agreed that we should consider this particular section paragraph by paragraph, rather than read it as an entire section, preliminary to the submission of amendments. The motion to consider this section by paragraphs was made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Now with respect to the parliamentary objection raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] to the motion to strike out, I wish to say that this objection should not be sustained. It is perfectly competent at any time to strike out anything. We could strike out this entire paragraph. The committee can not be hindered by anything in parliamentary law from taking this action. Why should not the committee strike out this entire paragraph if it so desires? If it is competent for the House to do the greater thing, then it has the power to do the lesser thing therein included. If it can strike out the entire paragraph, it can strike out any language forming a part of the paragraph.

Now as to the committee's next step, neither the Chair, nor anyone in the committee is competent to anticipate what that step may be. The motion to strike out may propose a foolish thing, but if it is in parliamentary form, it is not for the Chair to determine whether the action proposed is wise, or foolish. The one thing for the Chair to determine is whether the motion is in order as a parliamentary proposition.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course the gentleman would not contend that on an appropriation bill you could change the language of a section in such a way as to change the existing law?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this motion does not do that. This motion does not change existing law, by striking out the language proposed. The gentleman is trying to anticipate the possible action of the committee, and argues that because the suggested action may not be in order, therefore the pending motion is not in order. If you strike out the proposed language of this paragraph, what existing law do you change? Existing law is left unchanged, if the pending motion is sustained. If the committee strikes out the language proposed, the Secretary of Agriculture will still be empowered to do in his discretion, the very things contemplated by this language.

Now as I have said, Mr. Chairman, it would be perfectly competent for the committee to strike out everything in this paragraph but the word "For." As to whether or not that would be a wise thing to do, is not a matter for parliamentary determination. I maintain that it is within the competency of the committee, or of the House, to strike out anything in a bill at any time when it is in order to make that motion. That is all that is presented at this time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Is it not a well-defined principle of parliamentary procedure that you can not reach a thing by indirection that you can not reach by a direct measure?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. On the other hand, I may say that it is perfectly competent to do by direction, what you can by indirection. But the gentleman is anticipating something to follow the motion to strike out. The gentleman's idea is that the Chairman should rule that the motion to strike out is not in order, on the ground that some later motion not in order will be made. But you can not anticipate such action, so as to make out of order a perfectly competent pending motion.

Mr. FESS. On Saturday it was declared out of order to strike out and insert in the same motion.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Here you propose to strike out in one motion and insert in another.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. They are separate things. These motions are not tied up with each other.

Mr. FESS. You can not do indirectly what you are not allowed to do directly.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. You can not anticipate what will be done. There may be a thousand things done. We are not concerned with anything but the simple motion to strike out, and whether, or not, that is in order.

Mr. FESS. That is a fiction.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It is not a fiction at all, because our rules expressly provide that you can move to strike out and insert, or merely to strike out.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the gentleman a specific question.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Can you reach by two motions a thing that you can not reach by one which is out of order?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Unquestionably. But even that has nothing to do with the pending situation. This is a proposition to strike out certain language in the bill——

Mr. FESS. So as to insert something else.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all. It is just to strike out. I would like to have some parliamentarian in this House undertake to say why you can not strike out this language from the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. As I understand it, the phraseology belongs in an appropriation bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This is not an appropriation bill. The suggestion has nothing to do with the situation.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There was an agreement.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Very well; I am not arguing on that. But at any rate, I only want to ask the gentleman whether the present language is not "increasing food production and eliminating waste and the conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods"?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If you strike out those words, you strike out the limitation in the law and broaden the law.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. These words are the limitation in the proposed law, and it is perfectly in order to strike out of this law, any limitation, or any language. That is all it is. It is simply a parliamentary proposition.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is not that a limitation that exists now in the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not know whether it is or not, but that does not make a particle of difference. Let the gentlemen have in mind the parliamentary status of this proposition, and keep the merits of it out of consideration. We are concerned with what this committee is able to do as a parliamentary body, what it can, or can not do. There is nothing before us except the motion to strike out.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I disagree with the gentleman on the subject of whether it is being considered as an appropriation bill or not.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I waive that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I find that on this subject the Chairman said:

> The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. Is there objection to it?

And the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] had asked unanimous consent that this portion of the bill be considered under the rule governing appropriation bills. That is on page 2947 of the RECORD.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman does not read far enough. What the gentleman from Iowa proposed was that this bill, so far as this section was concerned, should be considered by paragraphs, and that was what the Chair put.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That was only one part of it. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asked the whole thing.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is here. He can speak for himself.

Mr. TOWNER. The RECORD shows what I asked.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I appeal to the gentleman from Iowa if that was what was asked. I happened to be in the chair at the time.

Mr. TOWNER. The RECORD states exactly what was done.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. For the purpose of convenience, to consider this section by paragraphs.

Mr. TOWNER. The statement was made by the Chair that the request was that it be considered by paragraphs.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman from Iowa sustains exactly my recollection of what took place on Saturday which was that the committee agreed that this section should be considered by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chairman of the committee was temporarily absent for a few moments on Saturday, when the unanimous-consent agreement to which reference has been made was made. Consequently his attention had not been called to it until now.

The Chair observes that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asked unanimous consent that this portion of the bill, referring to these paragraphs, which contain certain appropriations, be considered under the rules governing appropriation bills, and that amendments be offered at the end of the paragraph. But it seems that the proposition stated to the committee by the then occupant of the chair was—

> The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this particular section shall be considered by paragraphs—

And that was agreed to. Now, of course the Chair takes it that the question is not as to what a Member may ask by way of unanimous consent, but it is the proposition which was actually submitted to the committee, and to which the committee agreed; and that in this case was that this particular portion of the bill, which is not an appropriation bill, be considered by paragraphs instead of by sections, as it would otherwise be considered. The Chair thinks that it is clearly in order to strike out certain portions of a paragraph or a section, whichever way the committee may be considering it. In holding that way the Chair is sustained by precedents galore. He will only take the trouble to cite two.

Mr. Speaker CLARK on one occasion held that it is always in order to strike anything out of anything.

As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] said, the amendment is not seeking to add anything to the bill but seeking only to strike out certain portions of it.

On March 31, 1904, Mr. Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, when acting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, held that amendments simply striking out words already in a bill will not be held not germane; and among other comments that he made, the Chair will read only this:

It is to be noted that this amendment consists not in adding to the language of the paragraph but in striking out certain words that constitute a portion of the paragraph—

And the motion was therefore held in order. The Chair thinks that whether you consider this paragraph under the rules governing appropriation bills or otherwise the point of order is not well taken, and that the amendment is in order. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. ANDERSON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have no doubt that the statement of the Chair is correct. The Chair does not, however, really decide the point I was trying to raise, and that is whether this appropriating section is to be considered under the rules which apply to appropriation bills or under the rules which apply to general legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair held strictly to the proposition submitted by whoever was occupying the chair at the time it was submitted, and would have to hold that the only request submitted to the committee was to consider this particular section by paragraphs and not under the rules governing appropriation bills.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am going to make a request that possibly will comply with the desire of the gentleman from Minnesota and bring this matter before the House, and possibly save time by doing it. Mr. Chairman, the Chair having held in order my motion to strike out, if that motion should prevail it is my purpose, as I announced on Saturday, to follow it with a motion to insert in lieu of the language stricken out the amendment heretofore offered by me authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to secure and furnish at cost, payable in advance, nitrate of soda.

I have no desire to consume the time of the Committee of the Whole, nor have I any desire to attack this particular section of this bill. If I can not accomplish the object I have in mind, I do not desire to discuss this specific motion to strike out the language containing the authority for the increase of foodstuffs by the educational and demonstration method. Therefore I propound this parliamentary inquiry again: Assuming that my motion to strike out shall prevail, and that I follow it with the motion I have indicated to insert in lieu thereof the language of the amendment with which the Chair is already familiar, I desire to ask whether or not the Chair will now rule on the question as to whether that would be in order? If the Chair rules that it is not in order, then the time of the House will be saved.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask that I be not interrupted for one or two minutes, anyway. If this language is stricken out——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not presenting a proper parliamentary inquiry at this time. I do that to save time.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I submit that the only purpose I have in mind is to save time. If the Chair rules that it is out of order, then the proposition is at an end.

Mr. LENROOT. I think it would save more time by not having this discussion as to the point of order unless it properly comes before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair certainly would not anticipate a matter that is not before the committee. The Chair meant to embody in his ruling a while ago the very point raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], that the Chair can not anticipate, even though he may have intimations as to what may follow, and he will not anticipate his ruling on a proposition until it is submitted in a regular, orderly way to the committee.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me state that the gentleman from South Carolina stated that the only purpose the gentleman has in striking out this language is to insert the language he has already stated, so that everyone will understand exactly what will be the effect of the vote; and so I do not think we need to anticipate the point that the gentleman has stated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The proposition before the House is to strike out the educational and demonstrational provision in paragraph 5, leaving the appropriation to stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is to strike out the language beginning with the word "and," in line 6, page 6, down to and including the word "others," in line 8, page 6.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, am I not entitled to speak under the agreement of Saturday?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman has been speaking for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I was arguing a point of order. I spoke on a parliamentary inquiry, and was interrupted by the gentleman from Wisconsin on a point of order. I ask now to be heard five minutes under the agreement of last Saturday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought that the gentleman was taking his five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; Mr. Chairman, much as I desire the information of the committee, I was addressing my remarks to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I stated to the House, in proposing the parliamentary inquiry, that I had no desire to defeat the provision of the bill providing for educational and demonstrational methods. Every man in this House knows that if my motion should prevail and that language be stricken from the bill it would hereafter find its way back into the bill, and therefore no man who is heartily in favor of that proposition could vote against my motion to strike out because he believes that it would discontinue the educational and demonstrational methods provided for in this bill to increase food production.

Gentlemen who live in sections of the country where the land is so fertile that commercial fertilizer is not necessary to the production of food can hardly realize the situation which confronts the States along the Atlantic seaboard because of the sandy soil, where commercial fertilizer is necessary. At this time, when the Government is calling upon the farmer to increase his food production, the farmers are met with this situation in regard to nitrate of soda, which can be imported only from Chile. Prior to the war it sold at $50 a ton, and to-day, by reason of the absence of shipping, the cost of nitrate of soda when delivered to the farmer is $85 to $90 a ton. The Government receives a superior grade of nitrate of soda delivered at Indianhead for $53.87 a ton, according to the figures of the War Department. The difference of $35 or $40 a ton will prevent the continuance of the production on the Atlantic seaboard of foodstuffs, potatoes, garden truck, which can not be produced unless a sufficient supply of nitrate of soda can be secured for the next year.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. How much ground will a ton of nitrate of soda fertilize?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. They use about 100 pounds to the acre. The gentleman can figure it out himself. It means that this next year nitrate of soda will be harder to procure. Nitrogen enters into practically every fertilizer, and as the price of the fertilizer increases the production of foodstuffs will decrease and the cost of garden truck and potatoes and such food will increase in value. This amendment does not call for one dollar of loss to the Treasury of the United States. It provides that the soda shall be sold to the farmers at cost, including all expense, payable in advance, so that no man can receive a pound of nitrate of soda unless he pays in advance. It costs the taxpayer nothing, and it will increase production, and that means a decrease in the cost to the consumers of the country, and it is of as much benefit to the cities along the Atlantic seaboard as it is to the farmers. It will not injure a single industry in this country, because this nitrate all comes from Chile. We are to build a large number of ships to transport supplies to Europe, and we can divert two or three ships to go to Chile and bring back nitrate of soda, without which we can not produce the foodstuffs to send to Europe. Common sense dictates such a course, and I can not see why any man should have any opposition to it. If we had the ships we would not ask for it, but without the ships we are bound to do it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Suppose we adopt the gentleman's proposition, would it be possible to get any nitrate so that it could be used for this year's crops?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. We can not get it for a month or two, but it will come here soon enough to use on late corn, and we would have it to use on the grain planted this fall. The production of wheat in the South has been doubled during the last few years through the agency of fertilizers. Nitrate of soda is necessary in Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, and New Jersey, where truck is raised in a great measure, and if we do not get the nitrate there will be a decreased production and an increased price to the consumer.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. How much nitrate of soda is imported into this country?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. More than 250,000 tons were used last year for commercial fertilizer. I appeal to the House to pass this amendment, for I know that if it is adopted in the Senate the provision for the extension of the demonstrational and educational method will be put back into the bill, and I will vote for it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing at this place a letter in regard to the production of food products in Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have a letter from a farmer in my district in Iowa regarding the conditions now existing as to the production of food products that I think may help Members to understand the situation, as viewed from the farmer's standpoint. The farmer who writes the letter owns and operates a large farm. He is a man of large experience and great intelligence, and he knows what he is writing about. He says:

I write you something of my own experience, presuming it may be typical of others situated as I am. My only son, who had been staying at home helping to operate the farm, joined the National Guard and went to the border. We had our corn plowed twice and so got along pretty well. We had 210 acres and raised about 8,000 bushels. Had a hard time getting it gathered, however. Help was poor quality, and we had to pay a big price. Men would get a little money and then quit work to spend it. But we got by.

Conditions are different now. Uncle Sam is calling lustily for men, unmarried men, and you know farm work must be largely carried on by boys from 18 to 30, and these are the fellows the Government is after. As a result, we are compelled to reduce, rather than increase, our corn acreage. We can not increase our potato acreage, and have cut our prospective big crop in two. We can not carry as many cattle as we should. My son is now at home, but is subject to call any day. We have two hired men, one a Dane and the other a city boy from Omaha. Neither of them much good without a boss right with them to tell them how to do things.

The future is not bright. My son will soon go. The help I have may also be called. Do you think a prudent man under such conditions would dare to put in a big crop when prospects are so poor for cultivating and harvesting it?

My neighbor across the road is struggling to get 100 acres ready for corn, but because of weather conditions and lack of help not an acre has yet been plowed. He has a boy to help, 18 or 19 years old—just the right age to enlist. If he goes, how can my neighbor raise his 100 acres of corn?

Proclamations from the President, resolves from Congress, buncombe from city booster clubs don't plow a furrow or plant a hill of corn. Somebody must expend some elbow grease. In fact, it takes real hard work and lots of it to raise a crop. Talk about inexperienced city boys 14 or 15 years old working on a farm to insure a crop. It is positively dangerous to give such a boy a modern team of from three to six horses. Some city parents are anxious to get their boys on a farm but stipulate they must not work in the hot sun. You can imagine how useful a boy would be if he did not work while the sun was shining.

The people in high places say we farmers must raise a bigger crop than ever before. How can we do this? We can not work more hours a day or more days in the year than we do now. We can not work more land without more help, and instead of getting more help they are taking from us what we have.

Is it not plain that if we are to even hold our own in producing crops recruits must be obtained elsewhere? I don't think a man should be taken from the farms who will stay and work on them. I hope the President and Congress will help us and not cripple us if they want to obtain the best results.

Another letter received is from two brothers conducting large farming and feeding interests. They are entirely reliable, and their statement is in line with many other letters received from those engaged in farm operations in Iowa.

We have between 400 and 500 head of cattle on hand and are feeding part of them corn on the blue-grass pasture and had expected to feed them all summer, but we see a great deal in the papers about the Government making a maximum and minimum price some time in the future on foodstuff, and we are at a loss to know what these prices are to be based on. We are paying $1.50 per bushel for the corn and in order to make any money on these cattle would have to receive prices fully as high or higher than the present market.

We are anxious to produce all the foodstuff possible on our farms this season but do not care to go up against a proposition that might cause us a material loss.

Any information you may be able to give us will be duly appreciated.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want five minutes on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time was limited by agreement last Saturday and apportioned among certain Members.

Mr. RAKER. I do not find the apportioning in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was furnished with a list on Saturday covering that apportionment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the paragraph which appropriates $4,500,000 additional for increasing food production by educational and demonstrational methods through county, district, and urban agents, and I am also opposed to the nitrate substitution. We have already provided liberal appropriations for these purposes. I believe neither proposition should be adopted at this time. Neither is a war proposition, although this is supposed to be a war emergency bill. There is testimony before the Committee on Agriculture to show that the average farmer is getting tired of these "educational, demonstrational" methods. They want more practice and better prices.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield in five minutes. I quote from the testimony of Mr. McSparran, acting for the president of the National Grange:

In the first bill, No. 4188—that is, this bill—there are some $18,000,000, as I take it, to be given over for the development of agriculture, and a good many of those general classifications, as we have been able to understand their meaning, are very largely a question of jobs and an enlarged Department of Agriculture; or, as some choose to call it, putting the Department of Agriculture on a war footing.

This farmer's representative thinks this bill creates "jobs." That is the opinion of the legislative officer of the National Grange here upon the ground in Washington—that this appropriation is largely a matter of jobs. That is a significant answer to the proposition as to whether this is a war bill or not. Now, as to the educational part of it. The same gentleman, Mr. McSparran, in his testimony, says that the farmer wants to get rid of a lot of "this machinery" that Congress is imposing upon him through these "educational and demonstrational methods." Says he:

I want to say for the intelligent farmers of the United States that we are getting sick and tired of being served out education whenever we come to a Congress or a legislature for justice and for an equal show before the law. The farmers of the United States can grow stuff and can attend to their own business, and they very largely know how. There may be certain sections where that is not true, but, as a rule, there is somebody in every section who knows the business of farming and the people of his immediate neighborhood have more confidence in him than anybody the Government at Washington or the governments in the capitals of the several States can send into that community; and we are getting a little restive under this infernal information business. We have been swamped with information, and we have been ruined by lack of adequate legislation to give us a fair chance on the markets of the world and in the general social status of the world with regard to taxation and all those affairs. Therefore I want to call your attention to the fact that we do not feel at this time that it is a wise thing to litter up the industry of his country with a lot of high-paid supervisors and people standing over us and telling us what to do.

Then there is this proposition which you must not forget and that is, the American farmers do not have to farm. Just as quick as the conditions are made such that he can not make a living, he will go into the cities and crowd the city boy and girl off the bench. He has been doing it generation after generation, and he can continue to do it and he will do it just as soon as conditions do not pay on the farm. They are not paying now, and they have not paid, and therefore in all your consideration of this question of agriculture you must bear that in mind. We do not ask for class legislation. We do not want the Government to make pets of us. We do not want the Government to put us on a plane by ourselves, and we have in certain cases resented some attempts on the part of the States and the Nation to do that to a certain extent.

Mr. HAUGEN. You mean that you do not want to be treated as wards?

Mr. McSPARRAN. No; we do not have to be.

Mr. HAUGEN. We have treated the Indians as wards, but have recently released them. Now, then, the white people ought to have something to say about it, also.

Mr. McSparran further says:

It has gotten to be the fashion or custom to delegate everything to the President. Now, I do like that. I think that you gentlemen were given certain powers in this most wonderful Government that the world has ever seen, and that there was a coordination of power and responsibility. That was done very wisely, and it was done for the purpose not of destroying the influence of a good ruler but of preventing the dictation of a bad one, and whenever you set up this precedent of giving over to the President the control of anything outside of the control of the safety of the country you are doing a dangerous thing. It has always been recognized as a fact that the President must be the Commander in Chief of the Army, but when it comes to the control of the food supplies of the United States, and things of that kind, it seems to me that, inasmuch as he must give into the hands of subordinates the absolute control of this proposition, because he can not personally see to all of these different things——

Mr. ANDERSON (interposing). Do you think that the idea that you have just expressed applies with the same force during the present emergency that it does to ordinary times of peace?

Mr. MCSPARRAN. Well, we have found this, I think, to be true in our country, that many times a so-called emergency has been the excuse for the inception of a principle that could not have been established in times of peace. For instance, if you will look back to every war that we have ever had, you will find that at the conclusion of the war we have had saddled upon this country a larger military establishment than we thought was necessary before the war.

Mr. Chairman, it is proposed in this bill to give the farmer $4,500,000 for more instruction, not for more work on the farm but for more educators to tell the farmer how to work, and some farmers apparently resent it, according to the testimony of the National Grange. The proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina is to strike out this educational, demonstrational business and insert $4,500,000 for nitrate for three States. That is not a fair proposition.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I think it is about $10,000,000 instead of $4,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; this paragraph would carry $4,500,000. The $10,000,000 proposition is before the Committee on Appropriations at the present time, and before that committee Secretary Houston, testifying as to this very nitrate matter, said:

Secretary HOUSTON. Well, of course, their two main crops are cotton and corn. The South, unfortunately, although it is as largely agricultural as any other section of the country, does not produce enough foodstuffs and feedstuffs for itself; it imports from the West in foodstuffs and feedstuffs anywhere from six hundred to seven hundred millions annually.

Mr. SHERLEY. But there is an economic reason for that; they think it better, normally, to raise cotton and sell it and then buy the others?

Secretary HOUSTON. That is the impression there, Mr. SHERLEY; but I do not share that impression, and I do not share it for this reason, if I may take the time of the committee for a moment: The farm load in the South in those two crops comes very nearly at the same time, and the dependence of the South on those two crops involves an economic use of labor. Unquestionably if the South were to practice greater diversification and use its labor more fully, more nearly the year round, I think she would be in a very much better condition agriculturally and economically—a very much safer condition—than she is at present. We made a farm survey of three counties in South Carolina with which I am quite familiar, the Piedmont district, beyond Greenville; and allowing for Sundays, holidays, and rainy days, excluding them and taking the days that were available for work, it was estimated that their labor was used about 45 per cent of the time. There are many factors to be considered; but I should say that the dependence of the South on two crops is very uneconomic and that the South can well afford to raise, and can raise, enough foodstuffs and feedstuffs to be self-sustaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the acreage to which it has been customary to apply nitrates?

Secretary HOUSTON. It is used mainly in the three States—North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia—but I can not give you the acreage on which nitrate is used.

* * * * * * *

I asked that question of one of our people this morning—Mr. Knapp—who is in charge of the demonstration work in the South. He said that other ways of increasing yields, such as seed selection, better cultivation, rotation, use of clover crops, etc., would be five or six times as important as the simple use of nitrate at a high price. It seems clear to me that even if you could get shipping with which to bring nitrate from Chile and you could deliver it at the same rate at which the Government is getting it—approximately $60—it would be unprofitable for the average farmer to use it at such a price.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, are you going to vote into this bill this second proposition of $4,500,000 for three States, where they refuse to rotate their crops, are dependent on one crop only, and have to buy the necessaries of life from other States? Is this such a war measure as warrants the purchase of nitrates for these several States where the soil might be improved by crop rotation? That is the proposition before you now. You are told that this is a war measure, and you learn as you read the testimony that nitrate is coming in under the cover of a war measure. It looks more like special privilege.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes, if I have the time.

Mr. CANNON. I was present at the hearing before the Committee on Appropriations, a part of which the gentleman has just read. In order to get these nitrates you would have to use the Navy transports, and the Secretary stated in substance that so far as he knew or believed they could not be used first, because Chile was neutral——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CANNON. And for many other reasons.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand by agreement of the committee that the time has been fixed and allotted on this entire paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina should prevail, I have an amendment which I would like to offer, and I want to know if my agreement is in order to offer that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can offer it at any time prior to the taking of a vote?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that we ought to adopt this amendment to strike out this educational feature. I do not see this work from the same angle as does my friend from the city district who has just addressed the committee. I think that the representative of the grange whom he quoted a while ago is speaking rather from prejudice than information, because this extension act under the Lever Act has been indorsed by a great number of legislative acts in the various States in which they have increased their burdens to more than meet the requirement of the Federal Government in making the act operative.

Coming from an agricultural district, I think I know something about the reception of that law in my district, and I doubt very much whether there has been any law in the last 25 years that has met with such universal response and favor as the Lever extensional work in agriculture. I would deplore an act of the House in eliminating it, because it would be an expression on the part of the Federal Government that the thing that the States have so welcomed is not regarded of importance by the Federal Government, and therefore I hope we will not strike out this particular feature that is provided by the amendment.

I appreciate the need of the nitrates proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. I recognize that the exportation of potash from Germany is cut off. I recognize also the need of this particular element for enriching the soil. However, I doubt very much whether it would be of any particular value at this time to add the amendment of my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. We have taken steps to ultimately supply the country with fertilizer of this character. I hope that that will not be a disappointment ultimately to the Government. But what I especially wanted to say to the committee is that while I have looked with a good deal of suspicion upon any measure of this character, because I am a little fearful we can not get the results that are recommended, I am positively convinced that in the range of prices covering all subjects some governmental regulation must be resorted to. The law of supply and demand in normal times is safe, but I do not believe that prices ranging as they are would range in this way if we were certain of our information. I think this bill will be justified in that it proposes to give us the information upon which the price regulation can be effected.

Mr. Chairman, the war situation is distressing because of the possible embarrassment to grow out of a lack of food supply. In normal times we need concern ourselves but little over such a question; but we are now in the midst of the most alarming abnormal conditions.

These abnormal conditions will display the most serious results upon feeding the warring nations.

A food shortage seems imminent, due to numerous causes, the chief of which is war's destruction.

Our statisticians tell us we are destined to have a short crop, due to seasonal causes. Then the general withdrawing of Europe from the production classes to enter the consumption class reduces the product in the warring countries. The destruction of food ships and cargoes of food by the submarine is the most potent cause of the shortage. The general disintegration of the labor market, which sees fabulous wages paid labor in fields other than agriculture, robs the farm of its native labor and embarrasses the farmer by a most deficient character of labor, and at prohibitive wages. The farm-labor problem is alarmingly serious.

The productiveness of the farm will also be less this year because of the lack of fertilizer. The German potash, so necessary for maximum production, is entirely cut off. The Chilean nitrates are also commandeered for the production of ammunition, and the fertility of the soil thus lost becomes a permanent loss this year, because we have no substitute.

It is estimated that the shortage of the world's crop of wheat this year will amount to at least 150,000,000 bushels. It may go far beyond that figure. As the season progresses very disquieting reports are being made. It is now estimated that this year's wheat crop will not reach 550,000,000 bushels. The average crop of the last 10 years has been 725,000,000 bushels.

Our exports of wheat the first year of the war reached over 300,000,000 bushels, while the average exportation for the past 10 years was only half that figure.

The annual domestic consumption for a period of 10 years preceding the war was 570,000,000 bushels, or considerably more than the estimated yield of this year.

It is too early to estimate the situation of the other crops, only to say that the season is not a promising one, either in cereals or fruits.

This shortage of production facing us, and the inevitable increased demand from Europe due to the war, can have but one effect upon the price.

What is true of farm products will be equally true of live stock. There is an inevitable sympathy, measured in prices, between live stock and the food that must supply them. High-priced corn means high-priced hogs. The danger here is the price of grain has already reached the figure where it is no longer safe to feed it to stock. It is a surer money maker for the grower to turn it into cash than feed it to animals to risk an epidemic. This means a scarcity of meat. In turn it means, accordingly, a falling off of the supply of milk and butter. All this means an ascending scale of prices.

There is positively no indication of any relief from the high price from the operations of the law of supply and demand.

The scarcity of labor, the shortage of crops from various reasons, the uncertainty of the operations on the sea all conspire to make the grain market most uncertain, and offers the greatest operation for the speculator in foodstuffs possible.

While I am just as much opposed to paternalistic activities interfering with the individuality in production and distribution of food as any other man, yet our people must do certain things.

First. They must increase production. While it may be too late this year to do much on the basic farm product, the plans must be made ready to do it at all hazards.

Second. We must cut off our wicked wastefulness. The average American family in its prodigal methods wastes enough to keep it. We must adopt methods of conservation of what we have as well as increase the supply. It is not enough to reach the maximum in production, but we must also insure the minimum of useless consumption.

I see no sure and safe guaranty of this outside of governmental action.

While in normal times the law of supply and demand can safely be relied upon to regulate these matters, we must soon awake to the real situation, unlike anything the world has ever experienced.

We must look to the farmer for increased production, and to all our citizens for decreased wasteful consumption.

For increased production the farmer must have farm labor, fertilizers, and transportation facilities. If the range of wages on the farm keeps pace with those in the industries, the farmer will be compelled either to secure increased prices for his product or else reduce his acreage to his personal ability. If he can not secure fertilizers, his own labor will be discounted to the extent of lost production. If transportation facilities are not supplied for seasonal purposes, his crops can not realize their value to him, no matter how great the demand elsewhere.

In abnormal times, such as we now witness, the price current is sensitive to the situation, and is easily manipulated by the food speculator. Speculation thrives upon ignorance of the real situation. A fright caused by the possibilities of an uncontrolled submarine campaign will induce wild buying among the housewives as well as the stockbrokers. This fear of exhaustion of food necessities induces the payment of fabulous prices, such as now rule. This will continue so long as uncertainty prevails. Had we the knowledge of food possibilities, both present and future, this fear could be allayed. At least proper steps could be taken to forestall this panic in prices. If there is a remedy it will rest largely with definite information of the public.

Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of this subject that I think should be considered—the refusal to continue the manufacture of grains into alcoholic beverages. We are furnished the statistics on this question. We are informed that more than 110,000,000 bushels of grain are used in the production of beverages, 415,000,000 pounds of grapes, and 152,000,000 pounds of molasses; in all, the amount of 7,500,000,000 pounds of food thus used each year. It has been estimated that this amount is sufficient to supply a 1-pound loaf of bread every day to an army of 11,000,000 men.

In the face of these bewildering facts, both in production of food and the dangers of submarine activity in destruction, it would seem a wise step to take to prohibit for the period of the war, at least, further use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I greatly deplore the necessity of supporting any measure that may lead to price dictation of foodstuffs. But I am quite convinced that unless we can by existing law prevent the gambling in food necessities we will be compelled to resort to dictation.

It is, I admit, undemocratic, and it will be resented by those of us who believe in the greatest possible freedom in all legitimate pursuits of the citizen, yet this is an unusual situation which faces us. It is different from any situation ever presented to us before and will demand new methods of dealing with it.

In the belief that this proposed measure will assist in both increased food production and conservation of what we have against useless waste I am going to vote for the measure.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let us see what the situation is. The amendment of my colleague is to strike out certain language in the paragraph providing for increasing the educational, demonstrational work of the Department of Agriculture and to insert in lieu thereof a proposition to insure a nitrate supply for the crop year of 1918. With the purposes of my colleague's amendment I am in hearty sympathy. No man appreciates more than I the value of nitrates in the production of crops, particularly in that section of the country along the Atlantic coast from the northern point of Maine to the southern point of Florida. It is, of course, an absolute necessity in order to get the largest production to have nitrogen in the shape of nitrates. Heretofore we have been importing from Chile. But I anticipate that my colleague will find a point of order made against his amendment when it is offered to the section which he proposes to modify; and I anticipate also that that point of order will be sustained, because with my small knowledge of general parliamentary law I do not believe the amendment which will be offered and which is necessary to accomplish the purposes of my colleague can possibly be sustained on a bill of this kind. I do not believe it to be germane. So I do not feel, therefore, that as chairman of the committee reporting this bill, with a responsibility not only to myself but to the committee of which I am the head, and the House of Representatives, I can afford to take the chance of emasculating that which has been carefully thought out in order to get the doubtful advantage of an anticipated piece of legislation for which I am heartily in favor, especially in view of the fact that I do not believe that the amendment can possibly be held to be germane to this section.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. For a question.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from South Carolina stated a few minutes ago that the value of nitrate was $85 a ton. For the calendar year 1916 there were imported 1,218,000 tons, having a value of $31.29 a ton.

Mr. LEVER. I have no doubt the statement is absolutely correct, that to the farmer in the Southland on the seaboard the price of nitrate at this time ranges from $85 to $100 a ton. I know.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. There is no doubt about that proposition, but with regard to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said as to the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston, that transports could not be sent to Chile without violating international law, may I say that, at the request of the War Department, Secretary Lansing has submitted that to the Chilean authorities, and they say it will be no violation of international law. The State Department has so advised me. And I ask my good friend whether he does not think that the statement of international law from the authorities of Chile and the Secretary of State of this country should be accepted in preference to the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. CANNON. If I may be allowed, in that hearing it is shown, even if it is true and we had the naval transports to spare and those were the only things that could carry the nitrate, it would cost $76 a ton to lay it down on the Atlantic and $73 on the Pacific coast.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No, sir; Secretary Houston said it can be laid down at Indianhead to-day for $53.76 a ton.

Mr. LEVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the purpose of the appropriation in this paragraph, we propose here, according to the statement of the Secretary, to put into every agricultural county in the United States the best experienced, full-grown farmer whose patriotism and experience the Secretary of Agriculture can requisition. The statement has been repeatedly made on this floor, not justified by the facts, that we are proposing to send out to instruct these farmers, and to help them, a lot of inexperienced schoolboys. That statement does not represent the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to strike out certain portions of the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 108.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For gathering authoritative information in connection with the demand for, and the production, supply, distribution, and utilization of food, and otherwise carrying out the purpose of section 4 of this act; extending and enlarging the market news service; and preventing waste of food in storage, in transit, or held for sale, directing the market movement or distribution of perishable products, and otherwise carrying out the purposes of section 6 of this act, $3,500,000.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend for the consideration of a committee amendment. There are two amendments printed in the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Those are our committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

Mr. MEEKER. The Clerk read, on line 12, "section 4." Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. That is exactly the amendment that the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 6, line 12, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "three."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it ought to be "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks to modify the amendment by making it "two" instead of "three." The Clerk will read the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment by striking out the word "three" and inserting the word "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment.

The modified amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 6, line 16, strike out the words "of section 6."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. LEVER. This is an amendment dealing with the total.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 6, line 17, strike out "$3,500,000" and insert "$2,522,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The lady from Montana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Miss RANKIN: Page 6, line 17, after the figures "$3,500,000," add the words:

"Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall, so far as practicable, engage the services of women for the work herein provided for."

[Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the work provided for in this paragraph—such as gathering information, extending and enlarging the news service, and preventing waste—includes activities that we have been accustomed to seeing women engaged in. And when these activities are so closely related to the home as is the food question, women are especially well fitted by their training and experience to do this work.

It is self-evident that women are going to fill many positions that have been filled by men in the past, and this is one of the places where they can be used effectively.

Women officials, with their understanding and sympathy for home problems, will inspire a confidence in the home woman, and will encourage her to cooperate with the Government in this emergency.

Women as housekeepers must learn to think of food in carload lots, in transit, in storage, in the board of trade, and in the national markets as well as in the small portions on the family table.

By using women officials to aid in this work we will concentrate the attention of all women on the larger bearings of the food problem. It will bring the home woman into closer cooperation with the Government.

Our higher educational institutions have been turning out a large body of women who are trained to deal with fundamentals from a scientific standpoint. We have in these women a new source of service which we should not waste at this time. I feel sure that these women will be capable and faithful in doing this constructive work. It would be to the advantage of the Government to utilize the services of trained women in the place where they would count the most for the country during this present crisis and also in the future.

Food conservation on a national scale is but the natural outgrowth of woman's traditional work. Women in the past have been concerned with the immediate preparation of food from one meal to another. They must now consider the food supply for the year. They must be individually concerned with the food supply for the whole country. And now, as we face this international problem of feeding the people, the responsibility is placed on all of us.

We know that with our unparalleled resources and improved methods of production there is no need that anyone should go hungry. Women must take an intelligent and responsible share in the world's work if we are to see that all the people are fed all the time. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that I would not represent, as the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, either the good judgment or the chivalry of that committee, if I should make any objection to this amendment. [Applause.]

A MEMBER. Discretion is the better part of valor. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the lady from Montana.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch the full purport of that amendment; only part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HOWARD. That is all right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I believe the figures 83-500,000 have been stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that amount has been reduced. The question is on the amendment offered by the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The announcement of the result was received with applause.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in lines 14 and 15, I desire to move to strike out the following words:

Directing the market movement or distribution of perishable products and otherwise carrying out the purposes of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CANNON: Page 6, line 14, strike out the following language, beginning line 14: "Directing the market movement or distribution of perishable products and otherwise carrying out the purposes of this act.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. If I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, Mr. LEVER, I would like to suggest to him that it strikes me that the language the gentleman from Illinois has moved to strike out was language which related solely to section 6, and which might very well be eliminated.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will make his statement, I will look it up in the meantime.

Mr. CANNON. This bill, if enacted into law as it now stands, will duplicate the functions of officials in the Government employ authorized to act and those who are to be authorized to act when the President and Mr. Hoover get to work, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has notified us that he is to introduce a bill from his committee on that subject in the near future.

I am not here to discuss the propriety of appropriations that have heretofore been made. They dwell in law and in appropriation. But if you take this bill and run through it, you will find that the proposition contained in this bill, not hinted at but provided for, instead of being an investigation to obtain information vests power in the Secretary of Agriculture to dominate absolutely and boss the marketing of agricultural products. It runs all through section 2, if you will read it. True, I believe section 2 was stricken out by an amendment. Whether that amendment is to be agreed to when we get into the House, I know not; but I will not further refer to it, because that was the strongest provision connected with the bill that would enable the Secretary of Agriculture to regulate the shipment and prices of grain, and so forth.

But let us go over to section 5:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with such State and local officials, and with such public and private agencies, or persons, as he finds necessary, and to make such rules and regulations and to issue such orders as are necessary effectively to carry out the preceding sections of this act.

Now, you might strike out the words "such orders." In fact, I was told by one Member of the House that there was an amendment that had stricken out those words "such orders." If such an amendment was agreed to in committee, the House may refuse to agree to the amendment. Yet you may take the whole bill, and if you strike out those words, the authority to make regulations connected with the various sections of the bill and with the words that I propose to strike out here leaves without such amendment a great department not only to control, in the language that is proposed to be stricken out, the directing of the market movement or distribution of perishable products but also the broad language, "and otherwise carrying out the purposes of this act."

Now, I quite understand that under the war power of the Government we can do many things that we can not do in time of peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let us see if we may agree on a time limit on this paragraph.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. At the conclusion of the reading of this paragraph the Chair recognized me on a former motion which I made in order that I might interrogate the chairman on certain matters in which I am interested. I then gave way in order that the chairman might offer some committee amendments. I should like to know if I have lost my right to speak on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not lost his rights.

Mr. LEVER. Would the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] like five minutes more?

Mr. CANNON. I should like about 10 minutes more.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Illinois can get anything he wants from the gentleman from South Carolina. And I will reserve for myself 10 minutes, of which I will yield a part. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 55 minutes, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to have 10 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] 10 minutes, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] 5 minutes, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] 5 minutes, and, as I say, I will reserve 10 minutes for myself.

Mr. MEEKER. I have withdrawn my request for five minutes in favor of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me everybody in the House has had a chance to speak on this bill at one time or another, and I wonder if we could not get an agreement to have a final vote on the bill by 2 o'clock? I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will bring in another bill at that time.

Mr. LEVER. I am inclined to think we will have no difficulty in passing this bill by the time the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is ready to go on. I have requests, Mr. Chairman, for 60 minutes, and I ask that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object.

Mr. CANNON. I think we had better not close it in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] objects.

Mr. CANNON. There may be interruptions which will run us over an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that perhaps he was in error, that the Chair should have said 60 minutes instead of one hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I do not know the difference between 60 minutes and an hour, but I do know that my request was for 10 additional minutes. Various matters may come up in the nature of interruptions which may run over the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] has objected, and that ends it.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 60 minutes of actual debate, the time to be allotted to the various gentlemen as suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in 60 minutes, actual debate, the time allotted to be as suggested.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of order that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-seven Members present, a quorum. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEEKER. The motion is that there shall be 60 minutes of actual debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this whole bill taken together, if enacted, not only obtains information but read through section by section as it stands does give power, in my judgment, without any doubt, so far as the agricultural products of the country are concerned, to the Secretary of Agriculture to regulate the market. I have, however, stated that before.

Now, I speak of the war power of the Government. In time of war, of course, the Government may not only conscript its citizens for service in the Army but under certain conditions martial law may be declared, and under certain conditions the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended, and possibly in the present condition in the United States legislation giving the Secretary of Agriculture the power that he would have under this bill may be sustained. Let us say that it can be for the sake of what I desire to say. Is it best to give him that power? Here we are 3,000 miles from the seat of war, with 100,000,000 people, the greatest producing country on earth, loaning our allies large amounts of money that will have to be increased to send our armies across the sea. By the hundreds of millions of dollars we are appropriating to build ships for the merchant marine. Somebody has said that if this war lasted two years longer that outside of the extraordinary expenditures that we must make we would probably owe $30,000,000,000.

I am not here as a pessimist; I am not here as an obstructionist; I am not here to make an attack on the administration, but I am here for the purpose, in the brief time that I have, to say that we ought to be careful about legislation made under the present hysterical conditions, with the pulpit, with the newspapers, with two-thirds of the people who are not farmers, following their callings, agonizing about the price of food, the price of food, the price of food, and calling for legislation that will regulate the price in the markets; and it is here in this section.

Well, is food the only pebble on the beach? [Laughter.] There is some legislation pending to regulate the newspapers under the espionage bill. What it is to result in I do not know; but the newspapers are quite able to take care of themselves, so far as that is concerned. Is anything said about the price of copper? Is anything said about the price of zinc? Is anything said about the price of coal? Great heavens! The prices of those products have been multiplied by 3. Is anything said about all the other industries? No; it is the price of food, the price of food, the price of food; the law must regulate that. Is anything said about the price of labor that produces the food? Are prices to be placed on agricultural products and the products to be seized? Will the President or the Secretary of Agriculture determine what the price shall be and then send you, if you are dissatisfied with it, to the courts of the country to recover if you do not get price enough, or to recover what you ought to have from an economical standpoint in man's chancery or God's chancery? That is a great privilege to one-third of the population of the country.

I would like to see this bill amended, and if this legislation is to be enacted I would like to see it cover all the productions in the United States. Why have this class legislation? Oh, well, it is said, the prices have gone up so very high. Why, wheat went up to $3 a bushel, and now it is $2 a bushel. Speculation probably is responsible for it; a conspiracy put it up, and that conspiracy, if conviction was had, means a felony. There is plenty of law, if it can be enforced.

It is said that we all have to eat. Yes; we all have to eat; we all have to have clothing; we all have to wear shoes; we all have to have coal; we all have to have oil; we all, or the most of us, including the farmer, have to have gasoline; and so on and so on and so on.

Now, I say again, if the Government is to take possession of the market of the farmer's product, throwing aside the law governing supply and demand, saying that you will take so much or we will seize your property—let it be extended to cover everything along the lines of public industry; cover, if you please, the mining industry; cover, if you please, all grades of agriculture, including cotton, including the products of the whole country. I am not here to scold about cotton. It is way up three times the price now that it was two or three years ago. It is the great necessity for munitions. If fully utilized, as I stated a day or two ago, from all I could ascertain, probably three or four hundred million dollars' worth of good food can come from the cotton seed. Let us not do this by piecemeal. I do not constitute myself the sole defender of the farmer. I have a farming constituency, I have a manufacturing constituency, and I have a mining constituency. We are all interested in the welfare and prosperity of each and every citizen as well as our own individual welfare, but in conclusion, I say, let us be square. In calling into being the war powers of the Government, let the war powers cover all of the hundred million of people instead of only one-third of the hundred million of people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] ought to be adopted, unless the language he seeks to strike out can be amended; but my opinion is that we should amend that language, not strike it out. When this bill was originally drawn it contained a section 6, exceedingly far-reaching in its effect, authorizing, and in fact directing, the control of shipments of perishable goods, and if this had been a part of the law it would have been necessary to follow that section with a provision under which if the shipment proved disastrous the shipper could recover; but the Committee on Agriculture struck out that section 6 before the bill appeared on the floor, so that there is now nothing in the bill that gives the power to direct and compel shipments unless that power be granted by the word "directing," on page 6, line 14, "directing the market movement or distribution of perishable products." That language was entirely proper in the bill so long as the original section 6 was in the bill, but the Committee on Agriculture has determined that we shall have nothing in this bill, at least, whatever we may do in other bills, that will authorize the Secretary to say to a shipper, "You shall ship to a certain point," and therefore the word "directing" should be stricken from the bill and other words be substituted therefor. In view of that fact I now offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois the following, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MONDELL, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]: Page 6, line 14, strike out the word "directing" and insert in lieu thereof the words "advise concerning."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment will then authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to advise concerning the movement or distribution of perishable products. Certainly we should not in this bill, the committee having stricken out section 6, which proposed a direction of shipments, leave anything as a remnant of that section 6 which would authorize any direction to the shipper; but, on the other hand, I think it is exceedingly important if this bill is to become a law that the Secretary shall be specifically authorized to advise concerning shipments of perishable products. I think there is a very valuable work that can be done along those lines.

I think the Secretary can be exceedingly helpful to the shippers of vegetables and fruits by making inquiries and investigations relative to markets and making suggestions to the shippers as to the market that is likely to be favorable to their shipment. A splendid work could be done along that line. The Agricultural Department is doing that kind of work to-day, and it is well, if we are to give the department the additional appropriations for the enlargement of their work, that we should give additional appropriations for work of this character.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-five Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and upon that motion I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the committee do now rise, and upon that demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. LEVER to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 0, noes 109.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote discloses the presence of a quorum, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] for five minutes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much surprised that throughout the debate upon this bill there has been a disposition on both sides of the House to filibuster and also to offer amendments with the purpose of defeating the object of the bill. As the chairman of the committee has said, a good many such amendments have been offered, among others an amendment to strike out section 3. The paragraph which we are now discussing provides for an appropriation for the carrying out of the provisions of that section, which is now numbered section 2.

I can not understand the position of Members of this House, either upon the Republican or the Democratic side, who come from large centers of population, particularly those who come from the large cities of the East and of New England, when they assume that attitude upon this bill. It was my good fortune to read the special report made to the Attorney General by George W. Anderson, Esq., United States district attorney for the district of Massachusetts, who was recently appointed by the Department of Justice to investigate the question of the high price of food, which is the most vital question before the people of this country to-day, because in my opinion if something is not done pretty soon you will have food riots in all of the big cities of the country. What did Mr. Anderson say? He said he was unable to find out the real situation and get the facts by which he could secure the indictment of these men who are cornering the necessaries of life in this country without legislation authorizing somebody in the Government to find out where this food is, and that is the object of what is now section 2 of this bill. In other words, this bill which is a short bill, which does many other things which are admirable, but which are not of such great importance, does this thing which the Department of Justice says is necessary in this crisis, and I am in favor of the bill, and I shall vote against every hostile amendment, because if there is one thing which the people of this country can not afford to have when we are fighting this great war, it is bread riots in the cities of our own country. [Applause.] And I trust that those Members who have been thinking of voting against this bill because of one little thing or another will recognize the real object of it and see to it that it becomes a law at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I am sure I am in sympathy with the position that the Member has taken. The question of speculation seems to be the one we are trying to reach and must reach. Do you think we can do it in this bill?

Mr. DALLINGER. I certainly think, Mr. Chairman, that under section 2 the Secretary of Agriculture can obtain this information, which would be the basis of the prosecution by the Department of Justice against those men who have stored large amounts of food and are letting it out gradually at the highest possible price, and who to-day, without any law authorizing the Government officials to go and find out how much they have got, say that the supply is short. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Is it not a fact that if we knew how much food supply there was, the speculators could not play the game as they do?

Mr. DALLINGER. Absolutely.

Mr. HAUGEN. If I may be permitted, I would like to state for the information of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], that when the bill was first introduced and was first reported by the committee, it had a provision punishing the conspirators as to food supplies, and an order came from the Department of Agriculture to cut it out, and the committee promptly acted upon the suggestion of the department. It is out of the bill. It was there once, but it is out now.

Mr. DALLINGER. I will say in answer to that question that it is not necessary to have a provision of that kind in this bill, because under the provisions of the Sherman law you can get this information, and even under the common law of the English-speaking people the Department of Justice can solve this question and can at least get indictments under the common law and the Sherman Act if they can get the facts. Moreover, in another bill which is shortly to be reported by the Committee on Agriculture, officials of the executive department of the Government are to be given the power to fix the maximum prices at which the necessaries of life may be sold, which will solve the problem of extortionate prices in a most effective manner. In the meantime, however, this legislation is absolutely necessary to secure indictments under existing law, and thus meet the immediate exigency that confronts us. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of no quorum

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and upon that I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the committee do now rise, and upon that he demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee divided: and the tellers (Mr. LEVER and Mr. HAUGEN) reported—ayes 0, noes 104.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote has developed that there is a quorum present. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is recognized.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I have refrained from saying anything on this bill up to this particular moment as I have almost continuously been engaged in other official duties; but I will say as to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]—and I know he means to perfect this bill by it—I think the entire trouble could be cured by using the word "advise" instead of "direct." One of the greatest losses sustained by the people of the United States during any given year is the loss in perishable foodstuffs by the wholly inadequate system that we have in vogue in the United States in marketing those products. The truth of the business is that the marketing system of perishable stuff in the United States at one time became so bad that few men were willing in some sections of the State of Georgia to engage in the truck-farming business, as in most instances they lost instead of gaining by such business. We could do nothing better in this time of stress and food shortage than to provide liberally for the intelligent distribution of perishable foods throughout the country and direction in the distribution of that food.

Now, let me give you an illustration of what has been done in Georgia. There is a gentleman now in Washington in consultation with the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture who has rendered very valuable service to our State in food conservation. When war was declared we found out that there was a very great shortage in cans for the conservation of vegetables and fruits, that very necessary food supply of this country. This young man went out in Georgia and organized farmers before they had put the seed in the ground to agree to plant so many acres of corn for the purpose of canning it. They agreed to plant so many acres of English peas for the purpose of canning those peas, and so on. In fruit they did the same thing. They agreed to can all of the available fruit that they had. Now, then, they come up against the problem of getting cans. The banks all over the State, several hundred of them, combined for the purpose of advancing money at low rates of interest to any of these farmers who wanted to buy fertilizers or wanted to buy cans or canning appliances for the conservation of this food.

Now, as I say, we are up against the proposition of getting cans. So they found out by application to the Secretary of Agriculture that they have a list of people throughout the country from whom we can get cans at reasonable prices. The banks are going to furnish the money to get these cans, and furnish them to these people. All of that information has been gathered largely by the Agricultural Department.

I do not know so intimately about some other features of this bill. The people of this country are paying a fictitious price for food in many instances, and the false profits are being made by the speculator. There is no question about that. I can draw a bill of seven or eight lines, and I believe when I state its provisions every gentleman in this House knows it would cure this situation. If we were to put on the statute books a law providing that the Secretary of Agriculture through his proper agencies could condemn and seize all food not in the hands of the actual producer, but which is being held for speculative purposes, and we sell that food to the American people at its intrinsic food value, and permit these speculators to sue the Government of the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction for the difference between the price so paid by the Agricultural Department as the real value of the food and what the speculator claims it to be worth, within six months from the day of its confiscation, I will guarantee you would see a great decrease in the price of food. That is where the trouble is. There is not any question about it.

And as far as the coal situation is concerned, I would put two-thirds of them in the penitentiary. The coal situation presents to a suffering public a situation that is absolutely unjustifiable. It is a source of much regret to me that our able staff in the Attorney General's Office has failed so far to take any real notice of this situation. They could have had at least a half hundred of these coal barons on the way to the penitentiary if they had taken notice of the condition confronting the people as to their fuel.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] is recognized.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those Members of the House who is so anxious to do everything in his power as a Member of the House to help our country along during the existing crisis that I am liable to vote for something that I do not fully understand and do not entirely approve. In my zeal to do the right thing I am afraid that I, like some of the rest of us, am liable to do the wrong thing.

Now, what is the situation? In five minutes' time it is a hard proposition to state any case, but let us look at the map of the world in connection with the question of the food supply. The world is at war with Germany. The Western Hemisphere, with all of its resources, is accessible to the allies, because they have command of the sea. The great Dominion of Canada, the United States, all Central America except Mexico, entire South America, Australia, Africa, and portions of Asia are open to the commerce of the world, the allies commanding the seas. The central powers have the Empires of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Serbia, Turkey, Bulgaria, and Roumania at their command for resources. It is the most staggering situation ever presented to me to think that with the central powers restricted to that narrow area, comparatively, and the allies with the command of the rest of the world, we here in the United States are in the midst of a panic of high prices.

I believe that this condition will readjust itself and that we are entering on a period of recession. As I stated the other day on the floor of this House, the allies at the outbreak of the European war, having placed enormous contracts in the United States for every character and kind of supplies, have been bidding against each other and the American manufacturers for the output of our factories and our mines and our fields, and prices have simply been soaring because the allies and the American contractors have been bidding against each other, and the producers of material and supplies of every kind have been knocking off the products on which they have been bidding to the highest bidder.

Now, since the United States has entered the war the situation is beginning to change and in a measure equalized and readjusted on lower levels. Certainly out of all this complex situation some organization will be effected by which our allied partners in the prosecution of the war will cooperate. If a partner in any business bids against his own partners for the raw materials that go into their manufactures they would soon bankrupt their own enterprise. The time has come when the allies must quit bidding against each other and knocking the products of the mine and field and factory off to the highest bidder. But that is simply a part of the situation.

The other part of the proposition is that here is $14,000,000 appropriated that is already in large measure covered by other bills for the identical purposes. Let me show you some of the troubles that confront me. It is not because I am chairman of the Committee on the Census that I mention them. I want to push this thing along as much as I can. But the last census was taken in round numbers for $15,000,000, a census embracing the population of the United States, manufacturing, mining, and agriculture, and involving almost a thousand different questions. The Census Bureau now has an available trained force that could perform almost all of the work outlined in this bill at a nominal cost to the Government. Here we are appropriating $14,000,000 to cover a great many lines of work that are already in the regular appropriation bill of $27,000,000—the highest figures that have ever been voted by Congress for agricultural purposes.

Now we are right in the middle of the season. The regular session of Congress is coming on, and the time for the performance of most of this work is passed. There is the difficulty that confronts me in this situation. I want to do the right thing, but I see here that we are liable to appropriate a vast sum of money—not so vast, however, in comparison with other figures we are considering at this time—but if we could save a few million dollars out of these large sums for one thing and another I think it would be worth consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. There is certainly a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eleven gentlemen are present—a quorum.

Mr. RAGSDALE. On that I demand tellers.

Mr. LEVER. Tellers on what?

The CHAIRMAN. You can not order tellers on that.

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order that that is out of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the committee is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, in my time I desire very briefly to interrogate the chairman of the committee with regard to a feature connected with this bill in which I am very much interested, and in which I think the Members of this House, when they have learned more of it, will be very much interested.

A day or two ago I attempted to get the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], who has just concluded speaking, for the purpose of asking him if he was familiar with the subject and could enlighten the House upon the dehydrating of vegetables, a process economical in its use, and one which would permit the farmer to conserve the products of the farm which now rot upon the ground because of his inability to find an immediate market for these products in their natural state.

I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee whether specific provision has been made in this bill for the purpose of having the Government experiment with the subject of dehydration, which has been so successfully used in Germany, and which has made it possible for Germany, without being able to get great quantities of food from the outside, to feed its own people during the war?

Mr. LEVER. I am very glad to give the gentleman that information. In the memorandum furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture to the chairman of the committee for the use of the committee, the statement is made that in the Bureau of Plant Industry it is proposed to use 20 or 30 experts in dehydration. In the Bureau of Chemistry, which would cooperate very closely with the Bureau of Plant Industry, it is proposed to make an expenditure of something like $50,000 for the purpose of doing that class of work. I think the Department of Agriculture, and certainly I know the membership of the Committee on Agriculture, recognize very thoroughly the importance of that line of work in the conservation of our food supply, and we are all very earnestly in favor of it, and I think the gentleman will be very well satisfied with what will be done on that subject.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not want to break in if the gentleman wishes to ask any further questions.

Mr. HULBERT. I merely want to supplement the statement of the chairman of the committee [Mr. LEVER], with which I am very much pleased, by the statement that I hope the appropriation he has referred to will make it possible and that the department will act upon the theory of providing a limited number of dehydrating plants for purposes of experimentation, which dehydrating plants can be put on flat freight cars and sent out into farming communities, and the farmers of those communities be given an opportunity to bring their produce down to the station and have it dehydrated. By dehydration, I do not mean the old-fashioned process of drying which destroys the cells, but the new, modern process which preserves the cells, so that when you eliminate the water and put the material away for a long time it remains in its natural state ready to absorb the quantity of moisture that was taken out, and when it is cooked and served it is just as palatable as if it had been served when taken from the ground.

I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] for a question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It strikes me this is a very important matter. Now, in order to make it practicable and useful, would it not be necessary to construct dehydrating plants in various parts of the country near the source of supply, and with that end in view would it not require a much larger sum than has been suggested here by the chairman of the committee?

Mr. HULBERT. Personally I think that is desirable, but the proposition is in its experimental stage, and like everything else you can not jump into it all at once.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. We need it all at once. We need it now.

Mr. HULBERT. It will be enough to come back here and get such appropriations as the results of the experiments provided for in the appropriation demonstrate necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULBERT. Can the gentleman give me one minute more?

Mr. LEVER. If I have 10 minutes, by unanimous consent I will yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina, by unanimous consent, yields one minute to the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULBERT. In that one minute I merely want to say that I have some samples of dehydrated vegetables which I have had in my office for nearly two years. They are just as fresh and palatable now as they were when I got them, and I am going to leave them on the table, in order that anyone who would like to examine and taste them may be able to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULBERT. I have only one minute. Noting the activities of the committee, and particularly of the chairman, upon this subject, I want at this time to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial from the New York American of Friday, May 25, 1917, which is highly and justly commendatory of the efforts of the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

ABSOLUTE FOOD CONTROL BY THE GOVERNMENT IS THE COUNTRY'S MOST URGENT WAR NEED.

As Mr Hearst pointed out in a signed editorial in the New York American on Wednesday, Congress is to be commended for the deliberate and careful manner in which it has reviewed intended legislation to meet the requirements of the present crisis.

To the credit of Congress and to the country at large represented by Congress, our legislators in Washington have not been stampeded into hasty or ill-advised action, and it is a most encouraging sign that Congress has not given any indication at any time of wielding its tremendous war-time powers except after statesmanlike consideration of every matter brought before the assemblage for decision.

The war-time food bills prepared by Congressman LEVER, of South Carolina, offer an excellent case in point. These two bills—the food-survey bill and the food-control bill—have been most thoroughly dissected and discussed by the House until now it may be safely said that they are well and sufficiently understood both in and out of Congress.

And, what is more to the point, this analysis of the two bills shows them to be very fair and very wise bills. They provide legislation that is needed above all other legislation.

They equip the United States Government with the machinery by which the Government will be enabled to preserve itself and its own people and to perform the herculean task of feeding the rest of the world in addition.

The world is facing famine. The countries at war are perilously near starvation; the countries not at war are not far removed from the same condition.

In this country prices are soaring to new high levels. Unless drastic restrictive and protective measures are enforced, and enforced very soon, this rich country will not only not be able to feed the nations of Europe but will find its own people suffering a degree of want and privation never before recorded in our history.

Apparently Congress realizes that no time is to be lost in thus preparing for the work ahead of us. And surely all haste should be made in passing these two bills that is compatible with a complete understanding of them.

Mr. LEVER has done his work well. The first bill, requiring a survey of the national food resources, is vitally necessary to the successful execution of the provisions of the second bill, which gives the Government absolute control of the food of the country and of its dispensation.

Germany, largely cut off from outside assistance, has been able thus far to withstand her enemies because in the very beginning Germany instituted a food survey. When Germany began to fight, Germany knew to the pound almost what was in her larder, and knew in addition what portion of the larder's contents could be replaced by what Germany could grow and manufacture.

Having this information, Germany arbitrarily assumed control of the empire's food supply and doled it out in exact proportion to its needs instead of its wants. Speculation in food, such as was carried on daily and hourly in New York to profit a few at the cost of suffering to the many, became a prison offense and soon stopped.

The submarine is Germany's great offensive weapon, but food control has been Germany's great defensive weapon, and is the answer to the ever-recurring question as to how Germany "is able to hold out."

On the other hand, England had no food survey, had no food control, that is, not while there was still plenty of food for the time being. England did not awaken to the necessity of such control until the visible end of her supply came in sight. The very lack of food control, such as it is now proposed we shall have, is the explanation of England's inability to longer withstand the ravages of the submarine.

These are plain, matter-of-fact illustrations of the necessity of absolute food control, of the vital necessity of vesting in the National Government unrestricted power of food distribution.

Only in this way can our resources be brought to the highest pinnacle of production and maintained at the highest possible level of constant supply. Only in this way can unfair discrimination be prevented. Only in this way can those less able to meet high prices be assured of protection against those wolves whose rapacity is not less keen nor less relentless in times of the direst peril.

Mr. Hoover, the choice of President Wilson for the position of food controller, has already opened headquarters in Washington and is now selecting his assistants. It is to be hoped that actual control will pass into the hands of Mr. Hoover as soon as possible. When that is done, this country will have taken its most important step in its business of war.

Mr. LEVER'S food bills are most excellent measures, and able hands are waiting to put them formally into operation when they shall have become law.

We suggest, Members of Congress, that they be made law at the earliest possible date.

Mr. HULBERT. Now, if I have any time, I will yield it to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. LEVER] a few minutes ago, in which he charged that misinformation had been given to the House as to the character of the men to be sent to the field, I desire to call his attention to Dr. True's statement on page 118 of the hearings. Dr. True says:

> There will be considerable difficulty in finding an adequate number of competent and sufficiently trained women to do this work, who can give all their time to this service. It will therefore be necessary to employ teachers and others on part-time contracts in order to have representatives of this service in as large a number of counties as possible.

The chairman now states that the Secretary's plan is to select practical and experienced farmers to go out and teach the farmer how to farm. I desire to call his attention to the statements made before the committee when the Lever bill was under consideration. We were then told that practical, experienced farmers would be employed. If the chairman will consult the hearings he will find that instead of employing practical, experienced farmers the men have been selected from schools and colleges. If the plan has not heretofore been carried out, what assurance have we that the Secretary's suggestion will be carried out now?

Before a vote is taken on the bill it seems proper to point out some defects in the bill.

First. A brief history of the bill:

The department's first proposition, section 16, provided for a lump-sum appropriation of $25,000,000, to be immediately available. The bill was referred back to the department with instructions to itemize. The department came back with H. R. 4125, introduced by Mr. LEVER on May 3, containing section 2, which made it unlawful for any person to hoard or to hold or to enter into any contract or arrangement for any necessary in excess of an amount reasonably needed, and so forth. The apparent aim of this section was to do away with evil speculation and manipulations, but no penalties were provided for. Of course, without a penalty clause it is even satisfactory to the gamblers. The committee amended the bill by inserting a penalty clause. The bill was reported. At the request of the department the bill was recalled and H. R. 4188, of May 7, now under consideration, was reported without the section making evil speculation and manipulations unlawful. In this bill the appropriation was cut to $18,510,000.

The absurdity of the whole proposition was pointed out. The agricultural papers and people in general have commented, when it was made clear to the department that the country, especially under existing conditions, will not stand for any such absurdity and robbery.

Now comes the proposition to reduce the appropriation, and instead of providing for some 7,400 fat jobs the number is to be considerably reduced.

The appropriations are made under the pretense of increasing the food supply by increasing the yield. Gentlemen, we have appropriated in the last 11 years more than $200,000,000 in hopes of increasing the yield. Instead of increasing the yield, the yield has gone up and down, and on the whole it is practically the same as when we started. We were at first told that the proposition was to grow two blades of grass where one grew before. Experts and scientists told us for many years that the yield was so enormous that figures could not be found to describe the increase.

But when the department was confronted with the fact that the yield instead of increasing was decreasing a new propaganda was inaugurated and pushed with much vigor. We were told that the increased yield proposition was a failure, and the necessary thing to do was to teach the farmer how to grow less!

Here is what Mr. Spillman, Chief of the Office of Farm Management, had to say, on pages 26 and 27 of the hearings, Sixty-fourth Congress:

> Mr. SPILLMAN. They are pretty nearly doing that.
> The point I am making, gentlemen, is this: That to go out and teach the farmer how to grow 200 bushels of potatoes to the acre instead of 100 bushels does not solve the problem; to go out and teach him how to grow 50 bushels of corn to the acre where he is now growing 30 does not solve the problem. But that is the kind of teaching that most of us have been doing in the past, and I am as guilty as anybody. I have talked eloquently—as eloquently as I could—to get the farmer to grow more corn to the acre and to try to teach him how to grow two blades of grass where one grew before. But that does not solve the farmer's problem, gentlemen.
> Temporarily there may be underproduction, but taking the average of a long series of years there is a permanent and unavoidable overproduction of apples.
> Mr. REILLY. What is the remedy for that proposition?
> Mr. SPILLMAN. To grow fewer apples.

The committee in Congress spent months in considering the annual appropriation, and $25,929,113 was appropriated in addition to the regular annual appropriation of $17,000,000, making a total of $42,000,000. Liberal allowances were made all along the line. Practically everything that was asked for or estimated for was allowed. Now comes the opportunity to reach into the depleted Treasury for a number of millions more, not to meet any emergency such as an outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease and various other things, but under the pretense of increasing the production, which, according to the department's own statements and according to official reports, has not been and can not be increased.

The bill provides for two additional assistant secretaries. Under the law assistant secretaries are not even authorized to act in the absence of the Secretary. That honor has been conferred upon the weather man! Besides, when this bill was prepared by the department it was then the intention to have the Secretary act as food dictator. That plan has been abandoned, and according to reports Mr. Hoover is the man. Therefore at the present time there is about as much need for two assistant secretaries as for a fifth wheel to a coach.

The bill provides for a food survey. Judging from the progress made by the commission in fixing the physical valuation of railroads, and the progress made by numerous other Government agencies, the information intended to be furnished by the food survey may probably be available for our grandchildren; certainly not for this generation. In the first place, we have several thousand elevators, numerous terminal elevators, many packing houses, a large number of cold-storage plants, and more than 6,000,000 farms, each farm with one or more granaries. The content of every granary and every bin is to be measured and ascertained. Dr. Brand says we must have a certified statement from every granary, which means that not less than 10,000,000 certificates must be issued; but he says these certificates can be supplied by simply sending out a request and a blank form for making the return. If these certificates are to be of any value, they must, of course, be sworn to before a proper authority, for of what value is a certificate made by the food conspirators unless made under oath? If a conspirator hoards grain in violation of the law, and is liable to imprisonment or a fine of $5,000, or both, if found guilty, would his certificate, unless sworn to, be of any value?

But, you say, the Secretary is given authority to swear witnesses and compel attendance.

Yes; and if all the certificates are to be sworn to, 6,000,000 farmers must sit down and make out a statement and hunt up a notary public or a justice of the peace. After his certificate is sworn to, if he fails to answer all the questions or to stop his work in the field to wait on the Government's agent, he goes to jail for two years or pays a fine of $5,000, or both—a most generous provision!

Now the question is, if the farmer or merchant, or other honest and conscientious person, pursuing his vocation and duty in providing food to feed our Army, deserves to go to jail for two years and pay a fine of $5,000, would it not be fair to give the food conspirator at least one day in jail and make him pay a fine of at least $1?

No; the bill says not. The bill first reported provided a fine and imprisonment for evil manipulation of prices, but when it was thus amended orders came from the department to cut out this provision, and the committee promptly complied with the command. We are now told that such a provision will be made later. That is an old story. It is an old trick. It is old and absurd and not even a backwoods farmer will take stock in it. For more than a decade we were appropriating money for the fixing of standards, and it took 10 years before we could get a law to authorize the establishment of a standard. The objection made then is made now. The argument made then was to put it off and trust to the future. The same argument is used now. The same argument was used to delay and defeat the pure-food bill and practically every other remedial bill enacted. Yes; we are to enact a bill to punish the farmer, but the process of robbing the farmer by depressing the price of his product when he has grain to sell, and robbing the consumer after the evil speculator and manipulator has had an opportunity to do his work, is to go on. Not a word, not a syllable to affect him. As in the past, so in the future, he is to be denounced from the stump and glorified and crowned on this floor.

What has Mr. Leiter to say about these slippery gentlemen who are to be immune from prosecution for their evil doings? Here is what he is reported to have said:

[Clipping from Washington Times, May 12, 1917.]

"I can not imagine a more treasonable, unprincipled thing than for an American citizen to speculate in any grains or foodstuffs at this time," said Mr. Leiter. "The action of the Chicago Board of Trade in stopping all trading in wheat futures should have been taken months ago.

"Similar action should be voluntarily applied by every exchange in the country on which there is any kind or form of speculation in foodstuffs.

"As for myself, I haven't turned a speculative penny in the grain market—one way or the other—in 17 years. I did my last operations of that nature in 1900.

"There ought to be a law providing for hanging high any man who speculates in food products of any kind at this precarious time."

Leiter has been through it all. He is a competent witness. He knows all the ins and outs of the business.

Food conspirators have been viciously denounced by the press and by Members of Congress, especially in statements made from the stump. What are you going to do about it? Departments have been criticized for not enforcing the laws. To a certain extent it may be true that the laws have not been enforced; but, gentlemen, the trouble is not so much with the departments as it is with Congress. It is the joker slipped into the bills passed which makes the laws inoperative. It is the omission of laws and the enactment of defective laws such as the one proposed here to-day. Just as the Federal Trade Commission act giving the commission authority to investigate corporations but not authority to investigate companies and individuals that do the dirty work for the corporations. Hence all go scot free.

In another bill under consideration by the committee a food dictator—probably I should say a food manipulator—is to be provided. According to report, he is already appointed, and with the aid of the Beef Trust and sundry other trusts and organizations is going to fix the prices to be paid the farmers. Of course the Beef Trust and the other trusts sitting at the table, and the food conspirators, volunteering their services without pay, will fix prices that are satisfactory to the farmer and the consumer. With these people at work fixing prices, what need will there be to deal further with the food conspirators? No; put it off; put it off. Why should the farmer, designated as the most ignorant and least deserving of all of our population, object to $150,000,000 profit for the Beef Trust, or the meager profits made by the food conspirators? Why should he object to the practices of these high-handed outlaws now controlling prices, and putting a few additional millions in their pockets? Why should he object to giving the Beef Trust a free hand and absolute power to force out the smaller packing houses, and run prices up or down to suit their own sweet will? Why should the farmer and consumer object to allowing Armour and Swift and others to continue their practices? Why should the farmer object to holding down the price of wheat? Why should the consumer object to paying 15 cents for a loaf of bread? Why should the farmer object to a two years' jail sentence and a fine of $5,000? If he has no right to object, by all means do not disturb the evil manipulators, but pass this bill.

What a delightful message it will be to the producer and the consumer! How pleased the farmer and the consumer will be to see us come back! How they will rejoice—rejoice in the victory won for the conspirators. With renewed vigor the farmer will plant and harvest, and will place additional mortgages on his farm in order to feed an army, and for our return the consumer will work night and day and aid the much loved and favored few, the manipulators, and will pray early and late for our return.

Of course, some will object. Judging from Mr. McSparren, a member of the legislative branch of the National Grange, who appeared before the committee as a representative of the National Grange, an organization with a membership of several hundred thousand farmers, many will object. If you will turn to pages 204 and 205 of the hearings, you will find that he had this to say:

I want to call your attention to some of those propositions: In the first bill, No. 4188, there are some $18,000,000, as I take it, to be given over for the development of agriculture; and a good many of those general classifications, as we have been able to understand their meaning, are very largely a question of jobs and an enlarged Department of Agriculture, or, as some choose to call it, putting the Department of Agriculture on a war footing.

I want to say for the intelligent farmers of the United States that we are getting sick and tired of being served out education whenever we come to a Congress or a legislature for justice and for an equal show before the law. The farmers of the United States can grow stuff and can attend to their own business, and they very largely know how.

We have been swamped with information, and we have been ruined by lack of adequate legislation to give us a fair change on the markets of the world and in the general social status of the world with regard to taxation and all those affairs. Therefore I want to call your attention to the fact that we do not feel at this time that it is a wise thing to litter up the industry of this country with a lot of high-paid supervisors and people standing over us and telling us what to do.

On page 206 McSparren says the farmer has the education, he has the brains, he has the common sense.

On page 207:

A great many of the farming people have been to town once or twice, and they know what an up-to-date water-closet is; but the trouble is they have not had the money to put in those things, and the ones who have had the money have put them in and are continuing, just as they are able to do so, to put such improvements on their farms.

We do not ask for class legislation. We do not want the Government to make pets of us. We do not want the Government to put us on a plane by ourselves, and we have in certain cases resented some attempts on the part of the States and the Nation to do that to a certain extent.

I will read to you from one of the many letters received, which indicates what the farmers think of the bill:

Robert L. Case, Stamford, Conn., says:

Thanks and more than thanks for your speech against $18,000,000 for the Agricultural Department. Had better leave the farmer alone. Bucking against the weather is enough for any man. If you fellows at Washington did as we do, you would have 100,000 men in France now; so, if you will take the advice of a farmer, you will provide for men in the trenches and not legislate to keep them out.

An editor of one of the country papers recently said:

It is easy for Congress and the other spellbinders to tell the farmers what to do in the way of increasing crops. They seem to forget that the weather man is the first one to be let into the consultation.

I might read to you from hundreds of letters and papers received, but this is sufficient to indicate the sentiment toward the proposed bill. I might add that every one of the hundreds of communications received are against the proposition.

As stated by Mr. McSparren, they are sick and tired of being interfered with. The Indians have recently been liberated. Thanks for that. For years they have been treated as wards of the Government. Millions of their money have been appropriated for so-called "expert" advice and attorney's fees. Now comes the proposition to place the white man—the farmer—under guardianship and control, and millions of dollars are to be extracted from the Treasury under the pretext of giving expert advice to the white farmer.

What unpardonable sin has the farmer committed that he should be burdened with this heavy taxation and deprived of protection against evil gambling and the food conspirator? Has he not done his bit? Must he come to Washington to get his just recognition? Politicians and Congress have been most generous in the dispensation of eulogies and good promises from the stump, but, as McSparren says, the people are getting sick and tired of the rock handed to them. They have been served with jokers and have been deceived long enough. It is about time for Congress to wake up and do something. Read party platforms and campaign pledges and demonstrate to the farmer and consumer that platforms were made to stand on and not to get in on.

I have been severely criticized by Members for objecting to some of the provisions of this bill and for my attempt to amend the bill in such a manner as to provide a punishment and penalty for the food conspirator. It is possible that I was in error in these humble efforts and that those conspirators should be immune to the provisions of this bill; but as I have been reinforced on the floor of the House and have received numerous letters commending my action in pointing out the apparent injustice and absurdity in the bill I find that I am not alone; and when, after the criticism has been made, I find that the department condescends to have the bill cut to $3,000,000 and the committee offers an amendment to cut it down another million, I assume that I was right to the extent of four and a half million dollars, so that having saved four and a half million dollars out of the proposed amount, if we can in the three days given to the consideration of the proposed bill amend it so as to do away with evil gambling and manipulation we shall be well paid for our efforts. If, in the end, the section making evil gambling and manipulation unlawful, and providing for a fine and imprisonment, is inserted in the bill, together with section 3, we shall, in my opinion, perform a valuable service, and if we enact the bill into law in its amended form and then go home and leave the farmer alone he will continue to produce the food, and if the department does its duty in enforcing the law the consumer will buy his food at a reasonable price while instead of buying Ford cars for 7,000 people to ride in all over the country we shall not only have 7,000 more men to send to the trenches but we shall have saved an immense amount of money to the Government; and if we cut out all of $18,510,000 we shall save a sum sufficient to more than pay 50,000 soldiers at a rate of $30 per month for an entire year.

Now, a word about the appropriations.

On March 4, 1917, less than three months ago, Congress appropriated $25,929,113 besides $17,000,000 as a permanent annual appropriation, all told, $42,000,000, the major part of this amount being appropriated for the identical purposes proposed in this bill. Practically every dollar for which estimates had been made was appropriated.

Now comes the department and asks for $18,510,000. It was made clear that the Congress would not stand for any such outrage and the committee suggested that the department be given $14,000,000.

The first bill made every dollar available for joy riders, which would enable the department to add 10,000 new people to the 17,000 now employed, at an average salary of $2,500 per year. Under the bills reported later it will be possible to employ more than 7,000 new people. If cut to $14,000,000, with the amount available for salaries and expenses, 5,600 may be employed. True, $5,777,000 has been set aside for the purchase and distribution of seed, but Dr. Taylor told the committee it is not the intention to purchase the seed this year, as it is too late. The seeds were planted months ago. By the time this bill is passed and the money is available the farmers will be close on to harvest, so there is no immediate need for the seed provision.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I understood the gentleman to say that the bill carries an appropriation of over $14,000,000, but to be accurate the gentleman should take into account that $5,770,000 of this amount is in the shape of a revolving fund which will eventually come back into the Treasury of the United States, which would leave the real appropriation a little over $8,000,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. I was referring to the bill as it was reported by the committee, and what the gentleman alludes to was put into the bill in the House by an amendment offered by me.

As to the other appropriations, the $42,000,000 already appropriated will be available July 1. Why these additional millions? For what are they to be raised? Turn to page 56 of the hearings, read Dr. Rawl's statement, and you will find that he has made a new discovery. He has discovered cottage cheese. Just think of that! The department has discovered that cottage cheese can be made out of milk! How it was ever discovered in the department is a mystery; but, be that as it may, cottage cheese has been found. Dr. Rawl says that there are hundreds of thousands of farmers that can make and use a pound or two of cottage cheese a day. To that I agree. To my personal knowledge cottage cheese has been made and used for 50 years, and I presume many hundreds of years before, but, like the discovery of alfalfa 100 years after Jefferson discovered it, cottage cheese has been discovered!

Now that it has been discovered, the question is, What is to be done with the cheese? Here is what the doctor has to say:

I believe that if you go into a county and teach the domestic science agent how to make cottage cheese, and how to make it on the farm—

And so forth.

The suggestion is, first, to teach the domestic science agent how to make cottage cheese. Nothing absurd about that. As some of you doubtless know, the process is a most difficult and technical one. [Laughter.] It requires both skill and science to fill a clean cheesecloth bag with clabbered milk, hang the bag on a hook overnight, take it down in the morning and empty it, add a little salt to the "cheese," and serve. Of course, if a little butter and cream is added, the quality of the cheese is improved. A quicker method, that of scalding the thick milk, is sometimes used, but results in a dry, often lumpy, product, more difficult of digestion than the cheese made by the slower method of draining in a cheesecloth bag.

At any rate, an expert is to be sent from Washington to nearly every county to instruct the county agents. There will be about 2,700 of these experts. After the domestic agent has been instructed and qualifies as an expert in placing thick, sour milk in a cheesecloth bag, and so forth, one step will have been advanced. What is the next step? The doctor says:

* * * and if that agent goes back the next week and gives two or three more demonstrations, and the next week does the same thing—

And so on, he believes the farmer's wife can be made to make and eat cottage cheese. [Laughter.]

So the proposition is, first, to employ domestic-science agents, next to employ experts to teach the agents, the agent in turn to teach the farmer's wife, and the next to make her eat the finished product, by just what process is not stated, but I take it, most likely by a force pump. If so, the farmer's wife and her family are to be pumped full of this cottage cheese, to begin with, only three times a week, and after several weeks it is believed that the farmer's wife will have attained the requisite degree of skill to fill the bag, hang it on the hook, take it down, and empty it. Nothing absurd about this, as there is not a 10-year-old farmer's girl in the country who does not know how to make cottage cheese and make it much better than any expert sent out from Washington.

Only $64,000 is estimated for this experiment, in addition to the $15,000 carried in the annual appropriation bill. And, as the doctor says, it is not a commodity that can be shipped across the country. Hence only a limited amount can be utilized.

For centuries farmers' wives have been making cottage cheese. What can not be used on the table is used as food for chickens and hogs.

Gentlemen, the cottage-cheese proposition is on a par with numerous other provisions of the bill. The question is, With the apparent slow sale of bonds, with $7,000,000,000 bonds and Treasury certificates offered, with a $245,000,000 annual interest account already added, with more than $5,000,000,000 already appropriated, can we afford to reach into a depleted Treasury for $14,000,000 to accommodate a number of most excellent people who are looking for a job?

The bill contains a number of wise provisions which, by all means, should be enacted into law; but, gentlemen, the price is high. Is it necessary to reach into the Treasury for $14,000,000 in order to get for the farmer, for whom we all profess so much esteem, his just dues?

Considering the intense opposition that has developed, and the general demand for a provision to punish the conspirator, it seems to me the wise thing to do is to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is there anything in the other bill, the sister bill to this, which will punish the food speculator?

Mr. HAUGEN. There is a provision which makes it unlawful, but they forgot to include the penalty clause. Of course any provision making it unlawful to do a certain thing without a penalty clause means but very little.

Mr. COX. Could not the committee put the amendment in?

Mr. HAUGEN. The bill came without the penalty clause, and the committee had the penalty clause put in, but it was instructed to strike it from the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Who instructed the committee to strike it from the bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. The order came from the department.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the department run the committee?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, no; the department does not run the committee. No department runs any committee, but as the gentleman knows, the committees generally do what the departments tell them to do.

Mr. Chairman, as I started to say, considering the opposition to the bill and the urgent need of improving it the bill ought to be recommitted. The committee can then consider it in connection with the food-control bill and incorporate in it the wise provisions in this bill. By so doing there can be no loss of time. Time will have to be given to the consideration of the food-control bill. The items in this bill have been thoroughly thrashed out and will not have to be reconsidered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take the time of the committee explaining the reasons for this appropriation which have been made very clear in the discussion which has been going on for two or three days upon this bill. I rise only for the purpose of saying that the committee, as I am advised, has no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. In fact, we feel that the amendment very much helps the bill, inasmuch as it undertakes to put in definite language what the committee had in mind in using the language now in the bill. I only desire to say that, and I suggest that the other amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois may be voted down. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming, in the nature of a substitute, to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, including the salaries of Assistant Secretaries appointed under this act; special work in crop estimating; aiding agencies in the various States in supplying farm labor; enlarging the informational work of the Department of Agriculture; and printing and distributing emergency leaflets, posters, and other publications requiring quick issue or large editions, $2,000,000.

Mr. McKENZIE rose.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 45 minutes, the time to be allotted to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDOW], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I first desire to offer a committee amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 24, strike out "$2,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$547,400."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, having been born and reared on a farm, and having been interested practically all of my life in farming and associated with farmers all of my life, having been engaged for a number of years in buying and shipping live stock to the Chicago market, and having the honor to represent one of the greatest farming districts in the United States in this body, I believe that I know something about farming and farmers; and I want to say in the few minutes that I have that I expect to support this bill, but if I had it in my power I would strike from the bill everything except the provision for a survey of the products of our country and the provision making an appropriation for a reserve stock of seed for next year. I would do that because I have but little patience with the so-called educational and demonstrational features of the bill. I live in a district where we have many young men who are graduates of our agricultural colleges, men who are up-to-date in every way, who have been taking for years the leading farm journals of the country, and they need no instruction along the line of operating their farms. I am heartily in favor of the proposition of taking a survey of the food supply of the country, and I will tell you why I am in favor of it. I think we ought to know how much wheat we have in this country, and how much corn we have in this country in order that we may know how much of that supply we may be able to export to the countries of Europe who are now our allies.

I feel this way about it. Having a knowledge that we know exactly or very nearly how much it will take to feed the American people, we should first take care of them. We have gone into a war, and we went into it for the purpose of upholding the rights of American citizens on land and sea, and, in my judgment, one of the rights of an American citizen is that out of his toil he shall have a sufficient amount to eat. I want to see to it that before we export our wheat and corn to other countries we have a sufficient supply in our country to feed our own people first. The idea of men going over the country talking to the people and saying that the time is soon coming when we will have to eat potato flour and corn bread, because the Englishmen and Frenchmen will not eat corn bread or potato flour and must have our wheat in order that they may have white bread! We have gone into this war on our own responsibility to defend American rights, and for one I am in favor of seeing that the American citizen is fed first, in order that we may carry on the war successfully.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman think that all of this hysteria is useless, and that we can really raise more foodstuffs in this country than we can export and eat both?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do, and I want to say to the Members of the House and to the country that, in my judgment, the time has come for some one to make a few optimistic speeches over this country instead of preaching so much pessimism.

The idea that in this great land we are going to starve to death is to my mind perfectly absurd. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is recognized.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, for fear that I may go wrong and put myself in opposition to real necessities of my country I intend to vote for this bill, because I intend to resolve every doubt that may possibly arise in my mind in favor of my country upon the conservation of food supplies as well as the marshaling of all the resources of our Nation in order to finance, support, and maintain our armies and the armies of our allies in this world-wide war. There are certain provisions in this bill that I would rather not see in it. In my opinion, the great Committee on Agriculture, if left alone and permitted to write its own bills in conserving our food and food supplies, could do it in less than a dozen lines much better than the present bill, and which would give the Department of Agriculture a scientific, complete, and correct survey of all food supplies in the country at a cost of less than $100,000. [Applause.]

Section 3 of this bill is the section which gives to the Secretary of Agriculture power to "investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, cost, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foods, food materials, feed, seeds, fertilizers, agricultural implements, and machinery," and so forth. I recognize the absolute, the burning, necessity for a complete survey of present food supplies in the country; but the machinery outlined by the Secretary of Agriculture in this survey is top-heavy, unwieldy, and inflexible.

Mr. Chairman, who produces the food of the country? The farmer. We have to-day in the United States 43,513 rural-route carriers traveling upward of 2,000,000 miles every day of the week. There is in the neighborhood of 11,000 star-route carriers by whom the people living in the country are supplied by mail in boxes. If it be the desire of the executive department to have an accurate survey of the number of bushels of wheat, rye, oats, and barley to be thrashed in the country in the next four months, the only thing that would be needed would be for the Department of Agriculture to print cards, turn these cards over to the postmasters out of which emanate the rural-route carriers or star-route carriers, and let these agents of the Government deliver these cards on their routes to the farmers and let the farmers answer the questions propounded to them as to how many bushels of grain they thrashed this year, and give the farmers franking privilege back to Washington City. If this method was adopted, inside of four months you would know exactly how many bushels of wheat, rye, oats, and barley were thrashed in this country this summer and fall. There would be no guesswork about it. It would be positive, certain, accurate, and correct. By this simple process we could quickly gather how many bushels of potatoes, corn, tons of hay, bushels of apples, and, in fact, everything the farmer grows and produces. We could quickly learn exactly how many cattle, hogs, sheep, goats, horses, and mules there are in the United States. It could easily be carried down to the poultry yards of the farmers, not only getting the actual number of chickens on the farms but the number of eggs produced each month.

This is plain, simple, requires no additional machinery, and it gets results. It is simply utilizing and using in a practical way and manner the machinery already in force and in daily operation in the United States. The only possible additional cost it would be to the Government would be to assemble and tabulate the information at Washington after it was returned directly by the farmer. It would not require any extra compensation to the rural-route carriers or the star-route carriers in taking this preliminary survey. How does the department propose to get this infomation in the pending bill? To expend something like $14,000,000 hiring men and women at salaries ranging fro $2,500 to $3,000 per year to travel over the country and make this report, and after you have gotten it you would not get one-half as accurate and correct a report as you would by getting it direct from the farmer along the lines herein mentioned.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. How long will it take?

Mr. COX. Thirty days.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I mean, the report provided for in this bill.

Mr. COX. I do not know. Six months, I suppose.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What will be the use of it then?

Mr. COX. I can not see any useful purpose it would serve at all if it should take that long a time.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the gentleman believe that the Government reports are fairly accurate now?

Mr. COX. Oh, probably so; but they are not going to be gotten and can not be gotten as quickly as you would get it under the plan I have suggested. There is a provision in this bill carrying four and a half million dollars which proposes to stimulate food production by "educational and demonstrational methods," and so forth. If gentlemen will read the hearings before the Agricultural Committee on this item, I believe they would agree with my friend from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]. I have a right to assume that Mr. Rawl, who was before the Agricultural Committee, was talking in behalf of the Agricultural Department. While before the committee Mr. Rawl said, "The department proposes to hire 260 men at salaries ranging from $2,500 to $3,000 per year." These men were not to be county agents, but to go around and talk to and advise men who were county agents, and they in turn to go out among the farmers and tell the farmers how they can conserve horse feed. All of which could quickly be done by a bulletin. To me this is an amazing idea. It is a revelation. It is somewhat startling in its nature to have a large number of men traveling over the country talking to county agents, lecturing to them, giving them advice, and they in turn to go out and tell the farmers where they are wasting feed to their stock. The farmer may not be highly educated in books. He may not know how to solve problems in algebra, geometry, or trigonometry, but he is a graduate at the hard school of experience. For 40 years he has learned exactly how to conserve his feed while feeding his stock. I have an old man on my farm, uneducated except in the school of practical experience, who would make one of these men look like 30 cents if he would enter his barn lot and proceed to tell him what mistake he was making in feeding his stock.

This paragraph contains another item of $75,000 to hire women to travel around through the country and talk to women agents and tell the women agents how they could go to the country and tell the farmer's wife how to make "cottage cheese."

One amongst the first recollections I remember while on the farm, upward of 40 years ago, was the way and manner that my mother made cottage cheese. No one ever told her how to do it. No bulletin, no book, no literature on this subject ever found its way to her home, but she learned it as the farmers' wives learn things—by the school of experience. It is these things and many others I could call attention to if time permitted that I do not like in this bill; but, as above stated, I intend to support it and continue to support every bill and every measure which comes upon the floor of the House which even in the remotest degree may tend toward not only conservation of our food supplies but an increased production of them.

Our soldiers must be fed and clothed, and fed and clothed well. We will have burdens cast upon us to feed and clothe the soldiers of our allies, and I am willing to vote every dollar, at whatever cost, which the administration wants along the line of conserving our food supply and increasing its production. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated a number of times on the floor of this House during this debate that we are facing a very serious situation on account of the shortage of food. That is true, and it is due no doubt largely to the shortness of the crop production and also to the necessity of furnishing our allies with food supplies. I am going to vote for any proposition which, in my judgment, will serve to increase the food supply of this country. I may say frankly that I think the present uneasiness in this country over this question is due to a very large extent to some of the reports and statements which have gone out from the department here in Washington, and others more or less indirectly connected with it, with reference to our food supply and the food situation. These statements have served to make the people of this country believe that we are actually facing starvation. They have brought about a situation where many people have increased the supplies in their homes beyond present necessity, and I know of nothing that has served so effectually to boost food prices as these hysterical statements which have been published over the country from time to time in the last month or two. I am frank to say to you that I doubt very seriously that the bill now pending before the House will serve to any great extent to relieve the present situation. For the life of me I can not understand how in this present emergency the employment of 3,500 or 4,000 people, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, or 7,000 persons, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], the ranking minority member of the committee, is going to serve to any great extent in relieving the situation which now confronts this country.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. SWITZER. Do you not think that the starvation propaganda has been ushered into existence for the very purpose of influencing Members to vote for these food bills?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know. The gentleman may be partially correct in that statement. I would not undertake to say what were the motives of those who have made these statements. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to believe they were made in the utmost good faith and with the best of intentions.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. In view of the incentive that high prices would give the farmer, does the gentleman believe that any of these agents going out through the country would tend to increase the production in any one district if high prices would not increase it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not. I was just about to say that I think that there are a great many people—and in saying this I want to say that I do not underestimate for a moment the tremendous importance of the splendid service that the Department of Agriculture is rendering to the entire people of this country—but I do believe that there are some people possibly who underestimate the intelligence of the American farmer. [Applause.]

I do not believe that the American farmer needs from four to seven thousand experts, so called, who, judging from past experience, possibly have a technical education, but most of whom are without any practical experience in matters of farming, to tell him what to do in this emergency. I do not believe that the American farmers need these experts to go out among them and undertake to tell them at this time, when the prices of foodstuffs are higher than ever before in the history of this country, that they should devote all their energies to the raising of foodstuffs. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not know how it is in the gentleman's district, but I assume that it is there like it is in my district and in other districts, that there is a great scarcity of farm help and that it is difficult to procure labor on the farm. Will the employment of these experts help that situation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not at all. And I will say that that unfortunate situation is increasing down in my section of country every week and every month.
